Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend is absolutely right.

I find it odd that the Government have sought to address the challenge of high housing costs in the south of England by concentrating development—it seems to me—in towns where house prices have been in general lower than average for the south-east region.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman spoke about trusting local authorities. What would be the situation in my constituency, where the local authority has run out of land and will have to build or find housing outside the borough? That cannot be done without mutual agreement between authorities or some kind of Government intervention.

Mr. Lidington: The hon. Gentleman puts his finger on it when he talked about the need for mutual agreement between local authorities. It seems to me that we need to have a sensible coming together between those authorities that want to provide additional housing and those that are responsible for the transport and public services that will be required if such housing is to lead to successful and sustainable communities. That has not been happening during the Government's implementation of their sustainable communities plan.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): I understand the hon. Gentleman to be saying that growth is expected to occur in places where house prices, as he pus it, are lower than average. Is he aware that the Housing Corporation says that an income of £40,000 is required to afford a house in Milton Keynes? Does he think that that is acceptable? What would he say to the many people in my area who have incomes well below that?

Mr. Lidington: I have never denied the need for more affordable housing. My point was that the areas in the south-east of England singled out by the Government for concentrated growth are not those where housing costs are highest. As I shall explain, one consequence of that approach is the real risk that the proposals will generate not sustainable communities, but a lot of extra road-carried commuter traffic, taking people from the new developments to work in other areas where housing costs remain high.

One of the things about the proposals and the Government's approach that I worry about is that the focus on building on the edge of existing towns risks not only drawing resources away from inner-urban regeneration, but making many villages even more exclusive than they are at the moment. I have a lot of time for the proposals coming from the Rural Housing Trust: one of the things that we need is small-scale developments in a large number of English villages of a type that suits the needs of those parishes and local communities.

Brian White: Is the hon. Gentleman not aware that one of the reasons for locating growth in urban areas was the fear that otherwise lots of villages would get swamped by development? Is that not what the hon. Gentleman is advocating?

Mr. Lidington: No, I am advocating what the Rural Housing Trust has been advocating: if small-scale developments were made possible, in some cases there could be as few as six, 10 or 12 additional homes in small villages. Those homes could be for people with a local link—perhaps they are employed in that village or have family members who are employed there. The villages would be sustained as balanced communities and we would avoid the need for so many people to drive in and out of them. We would be able to keep the countryside as a place where people are able to work and not just as a place to which well-off people are able to retire.

However, I want to concentrate not so much on those objections of principle, which I wanted to make clear in advance, but on whether the plan as it has developed in the past two years is likely to achieve what Ministers said they wanted to happen. From the start, the Deputy Prime Minister claimed that the sustainable communities plan is about far more than just more house building. The White Paper of February 2003 stressed the need for a flourishing local economy, good transport systems and high-quality public services. The Government assure us that they are determined not to repeat the planning disasters of the 1960s—indeed, the term "sustainable" implies that the development will qualitatively different from and better than past growth, and in particular that development will reflect environmental limits and not just economic pressures.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope) indicated assent.

Mr. Lidington: I see the Minister nodding. He thinks that I am giving a fair summary of how the Government stated their case.

Let us look first at the environmental impact. It is undeniable that the plans for the Milton Keynes and south midlands area will lead directly to the loss of greenfield land, and in some areas—south Bedfordshire is a case in point—to the loss of green belt land. The development proposed in the sub-regional strategy for the area to the south of Aylesbury threatens to build on green fields and lead to the coalescence of the town with villages such as Wendover, Weston Turville and Stoke Mandeville. In Kettering, about 80 per cent. of new build will have to be on greenfield sites and in Northampton about 27,000 out of 49,000 homes will be built on greenfield sites. I believe that the plan for Milton Keynes is to build not just within the existing urban area but on greenfield sites on the edge of the city.

Andrew Selous: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Minister could usefully explain what the Deputy Prime Minister meant when he said in a letter to the Daily Mail on 6 February 2004,

"Your article on Wednesday mentioned threatened Downing Street plans to allow thousands of homes on Green Belt land. There are no such plans. No Ministers are demanding the rules on Green Belt must be relaxed."?

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend speaks from experience of the real threat to the green belt in the communities that he represents.

The second issue is that of pressure on areas of particular environmental importance and sensitivity. I will speak at greater length in a moment about the Chilterns area of outstanding natural beauty, which covers a large part of my constituency, and the wider Chilterns area. The impact of these plans on the Nene valley in Northamptonshire is something that has caused anxiety to the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds.

Inevitably, housing growth on the scale proposed will lead to an increased tension in rural neighbourhoods between the demands of conservation and those of recreation—each a legitimate demand. The strain will become greater. There is also the matter of the indirect environmental impacts of the proposals, which include the traffic generated by the new growth; the carbon dioxide emissions that the study commissioned by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs found would be one result of the Government's house building plans; the added burden of refuse collection and disposal; and the impact on water supply and sewage treatment.

Dr. Starkey: Although I do not dispute that development has an effect on the environment, has the hon. Gentleman seen the interesting survey of Milton Keynes' biodiversity compared with that of the low-grade agricultural land that preceded it? There is greater diversity of flora and fauna in Milton Keynes than there was before, which shows that building does not necessarily damage the environment; it can create good, new, managed environments.

Mr. Lidington: The hon. Lady has just added an interesting item to my long reading list. I do not quarrel with her basic point, but, first, the forthcoming reforms of the common agricultural policy are in part designed to restore biodiversity to rural areas; and, secondly, one consequence of the Government's decision to encourage greater density of house building, which was taken for understandable reasons, will be to limit biodiversity in areas where there are plenty of green spaces and gardens within an urban development.

The hon. Lady's comments bring me to the third point that I wanted to stress in my remarks—the need for an environmental assessment to be done. The Government have hitherto refused to carry one out. If one considers what various agencies have said—I am not talking about Opposition politicians but about the Government's own watchdogs—there is no doubt that there is real concern about environmental impact.

In September last year, the Environment Agency's annual report on the state of the environment in south-east England said that development plans "could set off an environmental time bomb".

The agency's director for the Thames region, which covers much of the area that we are discussing, declared that "in some parts of the region we are reaching our environmental limits. Unless the environment is built into plans for development now we will seriously threaten the quality of life in the South East."

I therefore find it dismaying that the Government have still not carried out any serious assessment of the environmental impact of their plans. Back in April 2003, the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister called for such a review. All that has been done is that the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs commissioned one consultancy study, which had to be completed within six weeks. That is a completely inadequate response to proposals that will generate change of the order that we are debating today.

A report published last month by the Environmental Audit Committee was frankly damning. I remind hon. Members that that Committee has a majority of Labour members. Paragraph 47 said:

"ODPM seems to have taken the approach to sustainability and the SCP that by simply calling it 'sustainable' and mentioning the environment occasionally . . . the Plan is inherently and obviously fully compatible with the principles of sustainable development. This is clearly not the case."

Paragraph 52 stated:

"It would appear to us that many of the efforts directed towards achieving sustainability within the SCP are little more than a window-dressing exercise. This is unsatisfactory and bound to have severely detrimental consequences in the long term."

I ask the Government to do three things. The first is to carry out, even at this stage, a proper environmental assessment of the sustainable communities plan. Perhaps it could follow the approach outlined in the EU strategic environmental assessment directive. The second is to secure explicit recognition in the plan of the need to protect the special qualities of areas such as the Chilterns area of outstanding natural beauty The third is to acknowledge, to a greater extent than Ministers have done so far, the relationship between the environment and the plans for housing, jobs and transport. The Chilterns is obviously the area of which I have the greatest knowledge.

[Mr. Lidington]

The Secretary of State's proposed changes to the sub-regional strategy, especially paragraphs 48 and 59, imply that housing in Milton Keynes and the south midlands will help to meet demand among employees working in the Heathrow area and the western corridor. If that is the right interpretation of the Secretary of State's proposals, it would mean a massive further increase in commuter traffic along the inadequate roads that run right through the middle of the Chilterns area of outstanding natural beauty. It also places a question mark over the Government's claim that the plan will deliver employment as well as new homes.

Brian White: Is the hon. Gentleman looking at net inward commuting into Milton Keynes as part of the future growth of the city?

Mr. Lidington: The hon. Gentleman makes the point based on his experience of Milton Keynes. Looking at my constituency, Aylesbury already has a serious imbalance of housing over jobs. The number of jobs in the town has fallen in recent months and I think that the same is broadly true of south Bedfordshire. However, the latest version of the Government's plan includes figures that show a lower ratio of jobs to homes—at least for the Aylesbury area—than in the proposals as they were first published. I urge the Minister to look again at this issue.

There is real concern about infrastructure and public services, even among those people and organisations that are less sceptical than myself and generally support what the Government are trying to do. In September 2002, an independent study by Roger Tym and Partners predicted that £8.3 billion would be needed to provide the roads, railways, water and sewage treatment and public services to cope with the Government's development plans for the Milton Keynes and south midlands sub-region. A more recent study of the Aylesbury area by the same company last October concluded that for Aylesbury alone—the town and its surrounding area, not that part of Aylesbury vale district that abuts Milton Keynes—those costs would be in the region of £768 million. The original Tym study in 2002 stated that "unless an adequate programme of funding is programmed it is doubtful whether the scale of growth envisaged should be contemplated at all".

Let us consider what is, or is not, happening in respect of particular needs, dealing first with transport, specifically railways and the east-west orbital rail link. The letter that I received from the Minister's colleague, Lord Rooker, on 29 October 2004 made it clear that the Government do not regard the orbital rail link as a priority for public funding, despite the fact that the local authorities in the areas affected by it believe that the development of that route is critical to the future transport infrastructure. Lord Rooker wrote:

"we must look to alternative funding routes to contribute to East-West and other infrastructure projects in the growth areas. Developer funding is clearly a critical area and this needs to be fully investigated, alongside the other calls on it and we would also expect a contribution from local authority resources." "Local authority resources" tend to be a euphemism for a further rise in council tax.

Let us consider the rail link from the centre of Aylesbury to the Berryfields development to the north of the town. A letter to me from the managing director of Chiltern Railways, dated 1 December 2004, made it clear that some public funding would be needed if the project was to go ahead, but that the company was still in discussions with both local authorities, the Strategic Rail Authority and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to try to identify possible sources of funding. I hope that the Minister will give me some good news today and say that he has been able to knock heads together to ensure that this much needed and much wanted scheme can now go ahead. It is ironic that, at a time when we are talking about the need for enhanced rail services, the development of the sustainable communities plan has coincided with severe cuts to commuter rail services in Milton Keynes. I am sure that the two Members of Parliament for the city are able to confirm that.

On roads, I make my pleas again for my local area. We will need bypasses for villages like Wing and Rowsham, yet according to the Government's projections, the upgrades needed for roads like the A418 and for the M1 near Milton Keynes are not likely to happen until after the additional houses have been built. Little thought seems to have been given to the high-capacity road links that will be needed to cope with the extra freight and business travel that the development will engender—for example, there will have to be some link between the Aylesbury area and the M40, for which various options and routes might be considered. I thought that I was pretty unshockable after 13 years in this place, but I was shocked when I contacted the Highways Agency about its 10-year route strategy for the M40 and was informed that it was completely unaware that that was an issue and did not really think that it was relevant to its strategy document.

As for water and sewage treatment, Thames Water tells me that the sewage treatment works in Aylesbury will struggle to cope with the expansion set out in the local council's plan, let alone the sustainable communities plan. There is no money in Aylesbury's Ofwat allocation for new technology in the area until 2010 at the very earliest, and if a new sewage treatment works is needed, it will probably not start operation until 2016 or 2017. It is little wonder that the director of the Thames region of the Environment Agency wrote to me on 9 December last year to say:

"We have looked at the impact of the Government's plans for additional housing. As a result we have serious concerns about accommodating growth at Aylesbury in an environmentally sustainable manner."

He continued:

"We are presently pursuing Government funding to carry out this work, which is additional to that covered by our current budget."

I emphasise that that is a Government agency—one that happens to be chaired by a former senior Labour councillor, and one whose chief executive takes the Labour Whip in the House of Lords. It is the Government's official watchdog and enforcement body on the environment that is commenting in those critical terms.

On public services, I have heard the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West say before that Milton Keynes general hospital is pretty stretched to deal with the existing population of the city, let alone the additional population that would come under the Government's plans. In Buckinghamshire, the Vale of Aylesbury primary care trust, like all other PCTs in Buckinghamshire and Milton Keynes, is running at a significant financial deficit. In education, it seems likely that there will be a gap of between 18 months and two years between houses being built and new schools opening.

That does not add up to development that can legitimately be described as sustainable. The time scale for the planned development does not match with that for infrastructure and services and there is no clarity about levels or sources of funding. Frankly, the idea that £8.3 billion or anything like that will come from developer contributions is fanciful. I can find no serious observer on any of the local councils, from any political party or from an outside agency who thinks that developer contributions of that scale are possible. The Government need to engage in some joined-up thinking.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the difficulties in the whole scoping of this exercise has been the Government's tendency to assume that developers are a given and will simply come forward? If the plans are to succeed in any sense and are to become genuinely sustainable, is it not essential that there be a real demand on the part of developers, and that they can carry out their development and get returns from it? That is not assured merely by Ministers saying that they want that to happen.

Mr. Lidington: I agree completely. There is a danger in Ministers' statements about developer contributions. They are like children waiting for the tooth fairy. I see no evidence that developers will be willing to cough up money on the scale needed.

Mr. Hopkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lidington: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I want to conclude my remarks. Then he and others will have a chance to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker eye.

Underlying the problems is the undemocratic nature of the entire exercise. Power has been taken from local councils and given to regional bureaucracies or bodies such as English Partnerships, which are accountable directly to central Government. If the Government are determined to pursue their policies through the planning structure that they recently created, they should be able to do far better in terms of public consultation. From what I have seen, consultation as it affects my constituency has been rushed and scanty. Most parish councils and local community groups, for example, were excluded completely from the panel hearings on the plan that were held in Northampton last spring.

There is too much central prescription of the detail of the Government's plans, even if we accept their basic structure. For example, the plan says that new development around Aylesbury should be to the south of the town—the implication being that it should be on greenfield sites between Aylesbury and Wendover and based around a southern relief or distributor road. However, those matters should be entirely for the local council to determine. If the Government want to win over sceptics not only in Parliament but in the communities that we represent, they must show that they trust local communities and are prepared to change their plans from time to time in response to strongly felt and well argued local opinion.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I see six hon. Members seeking to catch my eye but, even with the application of Mr. Speaker's new ruling, we have only 40 minutes available before the Front-Bench winding-up speeches. I hope that in making their contributions and in accepting and responding to interventions, hon. Members bear the time constraints in mind.

2.31 pm

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): In view of the time constraints, my contribution will be somewhat telegraphic. I am confident that if my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) is called, he will fill in the gaps that I leave.

I am proud to be one of the MPs who represent Milton Keynes, which is a highly successful example of planned growth. It has a hugely dynamic economy and a pleasant environment, as everyone who lives there knows. Milton Keynes has excellent facilities, notably, our theatre, indoor ski slope, the first multiplex cinema—it has now been superseded by another—the Milton Keynes Dons football stadium and the shopping centre. Enormous numbers of people come from the surrounding region to use those facilities.

Everyone in Milton Keynes—the business community, the general population and the council—understands that further expansion of Milton Keynes is essential. It is essential for two reasons. First, there is an excess of jobs relative to the number of houses available for people to live in, such that, according to the 2001 census, the net number of people commuting in daily is 16,000. Many of those people would live in Milton Keynes if they could afford to do so. Businesses frequently complain to my hon. Friend and me that they cannot expand as fast as they want to because they have extreme difficulty in filling vacancies as there are not enough people available.

The second issue is the lack of affordable housing. I alluded to the Housing Corporation claim that a salary of £40,000 is required to be able to afford to buy housing in Milton Keynes. I suspect that that figure is slightly out of date. Many constituents complain to me about the lack of affordable housing to buy or rent. Consequently, many people live in overcrowded and unsatisfactory accommodation or live outside Milton Keynes and commute in because they cannot afford to buy there.

[Dr. Phyllis Starkey]

Most people in Milton Keynes—certainly the business sector and the council—therefore welcome expansion and the fact that it is to take place within an overall planning framework. They broadly welcome the structures that the Government have set up: the Milton Keynes partnership and the inter-regional board, which will oversee that growth and try to ensure that all the public bodies that will be affected by the expansion build the necessary provision for it into their forward plans. People welcome the commitment that has been given by Lord Rooker on many occasions that infrastructure will be provided in parallel with the new housing. All that is broadly welcomed, although there are many disagreements on detail, which I do not want to skate over, but which I shall not go into in the short time available to me.

It is not surprising that many people in Milton Keynes remain suspicious about whether infrastructure will be provided in parallel with housing. That suspicion is largely based on their experience, accumulated mostly under Conservative Governments. There was huge underinvestment and poor performance by the Conservative Governments in providing infrastructure. I need cite only the hospital to demonstrate that: everyone in Milton Keynes knows that what was planned was not delivered. That is the root of the many problems that we have had thus far, and we have been able to catch up with the population growth only recently.

I am not surprised that people who have had such experiences remain suspicious of whether the infrastructure will be provided. They also recall that during the entire period of Conservative Government, the funding for the national health service and local government lagged behind the population figures. I was incredibly pleased to hear in the recent announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health that NHS funding for Milton Keynes and other growth areas will be provided on the basis of population projections. That is the first time that that has happened, and it has happened under a Labour Government.

Also under the present Government, significant capital sums have been spent on upgrading provision at the hospital, including at the beginning of this year the opening of the £12 million treatment centre with its four extra operating theatres, which has won plaudits from all and sundry, including unsolicited letters in the local press. There has also been provision of new GP surgeries on the eastern and western sides of the city, where growth is happening, and in the older parts, as well as funding for a new health centre at Wolverton.

Contrary to the experience alluded to by the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), since the Labour Government were elected, the local council, whether it has been Labour or Liberal Democrat controlled—as it is now—has never made a request for money for school building that has not been met. On some occasions, the request has come through a bit late, which is why the funding has been late. I suggest that if the hon. Gentleman is having problems, he speaks to his local authority and asks it to get its planning in sync so that it knows when to ask the Government for money for new schools, instead of just complaining when it does not turn up. The local authority has received an extra £9 million for growth and the third largest increase in percentage terms of any local authority in England both this year and last.

The first issue that I want to highlight is rail. There is a problem with commuter services on the west coast main line, which I have been working closely with the new rail user group, the partnership board and the council to address. I am confident that Ministers will respond soon to the bid to put in an extra platform at Milton Keynes Central station, which will deal with the overall problem.

I am glad that we have already built more than 1,000 affordable houses over three years, 516 of them for key workers, and I want that development to continue. I have major concerns about the detail of the local plan process and how it is being handled by the council. In particular, I am concerned about the quixotic decision by the local inspector to include area 11 and exclude area 10.4 from the local plan for 2001 to 2016. I am very annoyed that the Liberal Democrat-controlled council went along with the decision when it had perfectly good planning reasons to ignore the inspector. I will continue to work with local residents on that issue to ensure that we get back to what the local plan said and do not go with it as it is at present.

My final point is about the extraordinary suggestion by the hon. Member for Aylesbury that all the growth can be contained by expanding villages and providing jobs in them. How many of the firms in Milton Keynes is he proposing should move out into villages around the city? How many villages will have to be expanded to make up the houses needed for the 16,000 jobs already in Milton Keynes that are filled by people from outside?

2.39 pm

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): May I first congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) on securing the debate? Like many of us, he is aware of the sheer anger felt locally at the Government's plans. I am sorry to say that I do not think that the Government are aware of it. My hon. Friend talked about Government plans up to 2030. Fortunately, by then there will have been a series of Conservative Governments who have listened more carefully to what local people have to say and have not ridden roughshod over their views.

I intend to confine myself to the rather narrow margin of the next decade. Even now, the Government are planning some 67,000 homes for the Bedfordshire, Luton and Milton Keynes area by 2015, and the Deputy Prime Minister has said that it may be appropriate to revise those figures upwards. Some 40,000 of those homes are planned for just north of Luton. In one very small, already congested area—from Milton Keynes to Woburn, Aspley Guise and Toddington—3,230 homes are proposed. That does not make sense.

I realise that there is pressure for homes: there are changing living patterns and a lack of rental accommodation, which is much more suitable for many people. However, the Deputy Prime Minister's motivation should be called into question. When he first talked about his plans, he said that one of the problems was that people in the north-east and north-west of England could not find jobs there, but that there were jobs in the south-east, so we should build more homes in the south-east to attract people from the north-east and north-west to leave their homes there and come down here.

Such a proposition is back to front, like some of the Deputy Prime Minister's sentences. He has got it wrong. What he should have said is, "Let's provide more work in the north-east and the north-west of the United Kingdom", but he did not do so. We must consider why so many people in Milton Keynes are interested in expanding towards the south and the south-east of the town, when there is already a considerable development area further to the north and north-east. We know that if the town developed towards the north and the north-east, that would be welcomed by people in Rugby and Warwickshire, who are undoubtedly worried about the sink effect of Milton Keynes attracting industry and commerce away from them.

Why are the plans being proposed at all? Why are they being proposed for an area where they are opposed by the East of England Development Agency, which is a Government quango? Why are the Government deliberately misinterpreting the regional development plans and ignoring—despite what the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) said—the need for affordable housing by expanding into an area that is the most expensive part of the expansion area of Milton Keynes? Why are they ignoring the already overstretched infrastructure, as well as local opinion? The answer is very simple: the reason is money. If Milton Keynes develops towards Aspley Guise, Woburn and into the vale of Aylesbury, where land values are high, property values will be high; as a consequence, the community charge take by the local authority will be higher. Local authorities will receive more income. That is why the Government want the expansion there.

The hon. Lady said that there are more jobs in Milton Keynes than homes, and I accept that that is the case. She also talked about very high house prices in Milton Keynes. If house prices are very high in Milton Keynes, the answer to that is to build where house prices would be lower because the land cost is lower. That is not to the south and south-east of Milton Keynes, but to the north and north-east. If there are more jobs in Milton Keynes than homes, and if more homes need to be built, they should be built to the north and north-east, rather than the south and south-east. The plan is deliberately designed to increase local authority council tax take and to provide commuting jobs in an area from which commuters travel to London, and where infrastructure is already overstretched. The easiest way for people to oppose the Deputy Prime Minister's plans is to get rid of him and the present Government.

2.45 pm

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): A key point in answer to the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) is that market forces are driving investment in the area. If one did nothing, that investment would still happen. Milton Keynes has been a success because it was planned. If housing growth is unplanned, we get housing without infrastructure, as happened around Bracknell and Basingstoke. At junction 13, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, the Tory-controlled local authority is putting in businesses, expecting Milton Keynes to sort out housing, and then complaining that there is growth. The authority is trying to have its cake and eat it, as the hon. Gentleman tried to do, but that will not wash. His comments do not add up.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) has covered a large number of the issues. Other key factors are time scales and, more specifically, the number of houses built per annum. I am concerned that we keep to a level of housing growth of about 2,000, which is what Milton Keynes has been able to deliver. I urge the Government to aim for and accept that activity level.

There is a problem with the interaction of the different political parties, in that regional planning is controlled by the Conservatives and the local authority is controlled by the Liberal Democrats. However, beyond that there is a key role for developers, and the role of English Partnerships in delivering the Government's agenda has to be addressed. It is important that the Minister gives clear guidance to English Partnerships to operate in an environmentally sustainable way, so that issues such as zero-carbon houses are taken seriously. The transport issues that my hon. Friend referred to in relation to railways, which would apply equally to roads, should also be taken into account.

If my hon. Friend the Minister needs money, he could get it by scrapping the widening of the M1. He could invest that money in the infrastructure of Milton Keynes and the south midlands. I strongly urge him to do so, but I suspect that he will decline. Widening the M1 will not solve the problem, but if that money were used to widen the A421 from Bedford to Milton Keynes and to invest in local infrastructure, it would help with the existing development plans.

One of the problems with English Partnerships, local authorities and regional government is the way in which they communicate, which the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) mentioned. A large number of those bodies communicate in professional language—professionalese—that goes over the heads of ordinary people. For example, developers put out a development brief on an estate in Caldecotte in my constituency; they thought that they had reached an agreement, but in fact the language had gone over the heads of the residents. When local people saw what was happening on the ground, the developer encountered a massive reaction against it. That happened because the developers, the local council and regional bodies used planning language instead of plain English. It is important to use planning language when developing an interaction, but getting ordinary people on board and explaining what is going on is critical to success. I have suggested that the Milton Keynes partnership committee holds a daily blogging exercise through which people can interact with it. However it happens, the language must be right and information must flow.

There has been much concern about high-density development, mainly because in the 1960s it was associated with poor-quality development, but that does not have to be the case. I urge the Minister to say specifically that high density must be high quality. There are a number of issues relating to the local plans on the eastern flank, but it is not appropriate to raise them now as other hon. Members wish to speak. There are issues relating to the infrastructure. We have to get the development briefs right and not wait for the detailed planning permissions; we have to get the developers on board at an early stage, so that the genuine fears in the community can be addressed.

[Brian White]

Most people want the 1,500 families in Milton Keynes who are in temporary accommodation to be housed. They want their children to have houses and jobs. Those are the people whom the plans will benefit. Local people also want the rural areas in the north of my constituency around the Ouse valley to be protected, which is why it was made an area of attractive landscape. I was interested to hear the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire suggest that there would be no problems going into the Ouse valley. In fact, there would be real problems.

There are a number of important issues, but there is not sufficient time to go into them in detail. Milton Keynes can deliver on the Government's sustainable agenda if the support mechanisms are in place. The different levels of government must get it right, the communication has to be right, and growth must be backed up with the infrastructure money that is starting to come through and must continue.

2.51 pm

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I recognise that there is local housing need in my constituency and I defer to no one my desire for it to be met. All my colleagues who have problems with the sustainable communities plan want their local housing need to be met, but they disagree with the scale of the actions that the Government have proposed. I have wide cross-party support in my constituency. A petition was presented, signed by 17,000 people, backing our local objections to the plans, and leading Labour and Liberal Democrat councillors supported it.

I shall talk first about local jobs. The problem in south Bedfordshire is the reverse of the situation in Milton Keynes. Only half the residents of south Bedfordshire have jobs within the county: 12,923 people commute out and 1,083 are unemployed. The Government's figures predict that by 2031—admittedly quite a way ahead—an extra 100,000 people will come to south Bedfordshire, bringing about 70,000 cars. The Government want to turn south Bedfordshire into a dormitory town for London and elsewhere. That is the wrong approach. The Government are ramming far too much housing into the four areas in the south-east. A more organic approach is needed. It would be better to spread growth more widely.

If we have those numbers of jobs, people and cars, our already poor transport infrastructure will be further burdened. Our trains are full to bursting going south. The M1 is gridlocked, and even with the fourth lane it will still be blocked. The Translink proposals have been forced upon us by the Government and we have lost the opportunity for a proper east-west link across south Bedfordshire, perhaps going from Leighton Buzzard all the way to Welwyn Garden City.

Bedfordshire county council has calculated on a very scientific basis that for every extra 1,000 houses built, the Government should provide £38 million of infrastructure support. We have nothing like that on offer. The East of England regional assembly—a body that I will not be sad to see disappear—has itself criticised the Government's plans for the whole of the east of England as wholly inadequate in terms of infrastructure and transport.

I have several specific questions to ask. For some 20 or 30 years, Leighton Buzzard, my largest town, has been trying to get a community hospital. It is one of the largest towns in England not to have a hospital facility. I ask time and time again whether all the extra housing will mean that Leighton Buzzard gets a community hospital, but the answer I receive is no. The people of Leighton Buzzard think that the Government's promises are hollow.

A bypass is being built around Linslade. It has been planned for a long time and there is bitter controversy about it. I have problems with the route—I think that it is too close to Linslade—but what are plans for housing around it? All too often, new roads are used as an excuse to ram a massive amount of extra housing into areas where it is not appropriate.

Reference has also been made to the lack of local democracy. It is ridiculous that Members of Parliament are the only people able to hold a Minister to account about essentially local issues. Trust the people, please. Conservative councillors will get thrown out if they do not provide adequate housing for the families and young people in the districts that they represent. That will happen; it is how democracy works. What the Government are doing to local democracy is scandalous.

On the environmental front, there are massive concerns. Two Labour-dominated Select Committee reports have heavily criticised the Government's plans on the environmental and transport fronts. I noticed the headline in The Guardian of 14 October:

"Homes plan 'will swamp' countryside. Building 500,000 new houses risks water and roads crisis, says report."

The Government are being criticised from all sides—from the East of England regional assembly, The Guardian and elsewhere. Criticism is certainly not coming just from the Opposition Benches.

There is an alternative to the plans: scrapping regional planning and bringing back local control. We should not ram all the housing into four areas around London, but spread it more widely across the south-east and London. We should also, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed) said, consider rebalancing the whole of the infrastructure across the United Kingdom. We could also look at shared ownership, to bring housing affordability back to many of our constituents who have genuine difficulty getting on to the housing ladder in our constituencies.

I say to the Minister that there is very real anger and concern. Seventeen thousand people is only slightly fewer than elected me to this House in the first place. I hope that the Minister realises that.

2.57 pm

Mr. Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): I shall confine my remarks to a fraction of what I would have said if I had had the time. I am glad that the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) has raised these issues, which are of great importance to his constituents, to mine and to many others, as can be seen from the number of people in the Chamber. He is right to express concerns about the delivery of the growth area and about infrastructure. I, too, wish to see the proper provision of road and rail investment. However, I also want proper provision of health and education services, police, leisure and jobs. All that has to go together. The balance between homes and jobs is crucial. If we get that right, we will be able to diminish reliance on commuting, which is one of the most unsustainable features of modern life.

The hon. Gentleman is honest about his views. He says that he supports some locally determined development, but that he does not support the growth area concept with its national and regional strategic dimension. I happen to think that those dimensions are crucial. Any Government would have to address them. Although I join the hon. Gentleman in wanting the necessary investment in infrastructure, I differ from him in principle because I support the growth area as the practical way of delivering what is needed.

I believe that the growth area is necessary in our part of the world to meet not only population growth, but the increase in the number of single households that means that household growth as a strong feature of modern life will continue. As my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) said, it is also needed to give more people the chance of an affordable home to buy or rent. There is a shortage of housing for rent and of social housing. We need more homes.

The truth is that many of the plans embraced within and enlarged on in the growth area are not new. This should not be seen just as a narrow party political battle, as too often it is, because that stops people listening to the serious issues that affect everyone's quality of life. Some of the plans have been around for a long time—in structure plans in Bedfordshire and Marston Vale, under different party political influences in the Government and in Bedfordshire county council. It is therefore unfortunate that there has been an attempt to stir up negative and emotional fears among local constituents. If we approached matters differently, our constituents would be willing to look at some of the issues—which I accept are difficult—and might see that doing nothing is not a solution. That was not quite what the hon. Member for Aylesbury said, but it is not a proper approach to say that growth can happen, but not in our area.

I see the growth area not as a threat, but as an opportunity. We would all be wise to look at it in that way. There are, of course, challenges and difficulties, but it should be an opportunity not just for the new communities that move in in the future, as is planned, but for the existing communities—the people whom we already represent. If we are to have new villages and towns in the area, that will put demands on the existing facilities, such as Bedford town centre, which needs to prepare. Indeed, those matters are being considered, and I am pleased that there are a number of initiatives—I am not pleased, however, that I do not have time to mention them now.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) mentioned that it is better to adopt a planned approach than to pretend that planning is not a good thing, which was the ideological position of the Conservative Government in the 1980s. At that time, development was delivered, but usually by councils refusing planning applications for housing estates and the applications then being granted on appeal, with the planning inspectorate having only a weak ability to add legal agreements. The conditions imposed were unsustainable and not balanced, and all sorts of opportunities were missed through that approach. I believe that the current approach is much more positive.

There needs to be leadership in difficult matters. People might initially say, "Oh, we don't want this", but we have to carry such matters through, even though sometimes that is not a popular or easy task. We have to do it for the benefit not only of those who are yet to come, but of those who are here already. We should take that important aspect into account when we consider planning.

In Bedfordshire we have some positive news on roads. In December, there was the announcement of the A421 dualling between the M1 and the A1, which is essential for the eastern part of the growth area. We have a refreshing initiative on the funding of the Bedford western bypass—a pump-priming agreement, with most of the money coming in later from the private sector. There is some disappointment—if my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) had been able to speak today, I am sure that he would have mentioned it—about the east Luton corridor. That is very important for the region, for Luton post-Vauxhall and for the development of Luton airport. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will acknowledge that disappointment and be prepared to think again.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West mentioned the totally new approach to funding health services, which involves looking ahead rather than playing catch-up, as has been the traditional way. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take on board that enlightened approach from the Department of Health, for which his Department has been working hard, and apply that approach to capital and revenue funding for education, police and leisure services.

I also ask my hon. Friend the Minister not to regard the concerns of residents about quality of life, environment and biodiversity as nimbyism. Nimbyism exists, but people are right to have concerns about quality of life, their economy and their environment. We are all entitled to have such concerns. Issues such as water supply must be taken seriously, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will address them today and on other occasions. This is an opportunity to be positive, not negative.

3.4 pm

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): In a recent debate on the establishment of the West Northamptonshire urban development corporation, my position was surprisingly accurately and rather felicitously described by the Minister for Housing and Planning as one of pragmatic acquiescence. That same is true of the two district councils in south Northamptonshire and Daventry that I represent. We have an interest in making sure that, if development is coming to our area, there is a proper provision of infrastructure. That was emphasised by my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) in his masterly introduction to the topic; I merely re-emphasise it to the Minister today.

[Mr. Tim Boswell]

I wish to suggest a technique to the Minister. Each time there is an announcement, such as the recent welcome announcement about primary care services, it is important that Ministers not trip themselves up by not explaining how the additional need that they are creating by that announcement is designed to be met. They may give some thought to the idea of an annual expression of an infrastructure budget for the region that could be explained to people and which we can take to our constituents.

I now have some brief comments to make on some of the specific impacts that might not have received the attention that they should have received. They were not dealt with in the Department's initial planning, but still need to be taken into account. The first impact to which my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury referred was that of water resources. I return to that point because it is important to remember not only the capital cost, but the land budget for the provision of reservoirs and the whole process of planning and its acceptance.

I have an interest in the second impact of flood defence. Believe it or not, I was the Minister with responsibility for flood defence immediately prior to the present Minister at the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. We have had lethal floods in Northampton, and our significant local problems will obviously be expanded by additional development. The Minister will be familiar with the study carried out by the Association of British Insurers entitled "Making Communities Sustainable". I have carried out a quick head count on its calculations in respect of the major towns in the region that we are discussing this afternoon. It suggests that more than 4,000 houses would be built which is something that will have to be taken into account.

"in significant flood probability areas",

My third observation concerns the supply of aggregates. The second draft of the Northamptonshire minerals local plan is under review and will be contentious. One of its aims is to protect the Nene valley, to which my hon. Friend, has referred, by moving into glacial deposits, which is highly difficult because of environmental sensitivity. Given that the new proposals are not explicitly keyed into the plan, the danger is that we will end up with both the exploitation of glacial deposits and further works in the Nene valley.

I have two final and more general points to make, one of which is prompted by my discussion about aggregates. My constituency has an immediate boundary with that of the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) and my gravel deposits are next to her city. If we are considering the matter globally, it is a little difficult to see how such matters can be conducted in silos between the various local authorities, as if the rest of the region did not exist. I have merely flagged up the matter as a concern; it is certainly not an offer or a bid. I suffer such an experience bitterly and constantly. Being from the same long and thin county, the Minister and I both know that everything is on the boundary of somewhere. We cross three regions. There are other important regions such as the west midlands on my boundary. The Minister needs to assure us today and during his continuing dialogue with us that cross-regional issues are being dealt with properly.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): Is not the point of my hon. Friend's argument the fact that so many concerns have been expressed and that it is the process by which the decisions have been reached as much as the individual decisions that have caused those concerns? More time and more consideration, as various reports have asked for, would do much to help the Government's case rather than doing it damage as is happening now.

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend is, as ever, spot on. I shall conclude with a positive remark, which I offer to the Minister for nothing. I have—again in a previous capacity—some experience of national forest and community forest. I hope that, even within a structure that should not be driven by a huge planning mode, the Minister will consider, working with local authorities and the agencies that he has available, whether we can achieve some positive and fairly high-profile environmental impacts. I hope that he will also address the concerns that we all rightly share.

3.10 pm

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) on securing the debate. It is important that regional planning matters are fully debated. One of my criticisms is that, by and large, they are dealt with away from the public eye by quangos and other partly elected groups rather than by democratically elected groups. Pleasing him on that point is about as far as I am going to go.

My constituency is in glorious Devon, but I know the area that we are debating because I used to live in Oxford and my wife used to work in Aylesbury. We drove up to Aylesbury regularly and from there went to Northampton, where we had friends. I am not too sure whose constituency it is in, but I remember that there is a village called Hinton-in-the-Hedges. It is in a beautiful place and quite clearly the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell)—although he did not use this line—is trying to illustrate that soon it will no longer be Hinton-in-the-Hedges but Hinton-between-the-brick-walls.

Local people obviously have such fears when any development is proposed, but that is the point at which I begin to disagree with the Conservatives. They argue, "Leave it to our local authorities. Everything will be all right. If we do not provide housing for the homeless, the Conservative councillors will be thrown out." I have been in politics a long time and I know that it does not work as simply as that. When a development is planned, an action group is instantly formed to oppose it. In my constituency there are proposals for developments and an action group to oppose each one. I agree that most of them have valid arguments and I have ensured that their cases have been properly put. We have a vast amount of growth in our area and there is an argument that we do not need any more. Where there are action groups, the difficulties come with the fact that a few votes may be lost on the homelessness side but a lot more will be lost if one stands up and says, "I want to build houses on this green field", because the number of people affected is greater.

We are in part debating the decision-making process. Clearly, decisions should not be made by quangos. I do not believe that the Government have gone about their plans in the right manner or that there has been adequate consultation with the public and adequate public debate. The hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) made a comment about regional assemblies. They are deeply flawed, but if we had democratically elected bodies where people could debate such matters on a regional or sub-regional basis, we could have full public consultation and proper debate and we could come to a democratic decision.

Alistair Burt: What about county councils?

Richard Younger-Ross: Our party fought to ensure that county councils retained their voting and debating rights on planning matters, which the Government were going to take away from them.

When discussing infrastructure, the hon. Member for Aylesbury hit on a good phrase. We do things the wrong way round—back to front. Common sense and good planning dictate that we should put the infrastructure in and then build to it. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) made that point too. We do not do that—we say to developers, "We want to build some houses. We will allow you to build them and we will then charge you for section 106 agreements. You will pay us the money and we will then do the road improvements." That is a deeply corrupt and immoral way of dealing with the matter. It is also the wrong way round. If we want to develop an area, we should say what the infrastructure needs are, debate them, whether they be extra rail links or hospitals, and ensure that the investment is there to develop them. We cannot have the situation, which we have had too often in the past, in which development is allowed to continue without adequate schools, hospitals, roads or rail networks being built.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) talked about plain English. We need community architects; we do not need developers who use only technicians. Plain English and proper community architects are very important.

3.15 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) because it gives me the opportunity to put on record a proper interpretation of what he said. He thinks that he knows better than the Members of Parliament present about what is better for their area. He wants a mechanism so he can impose his decision through an unelected regional chamber instead of leaving it to the local representatives who are democratically elected to serve their communities.

I will take a slight risk and mention my own constituency. I have a Conservative council in Colchester, which has provoked a major row by imposing a small-scale development of social housing in a village. That has caused a lot of controversy, but it is an example of a local council taking responsibility, as my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) mentioned. If people are given the responsibility, they rise to it. However, what we are debating is not just one, but three regional assemblies—which underlines the ludicrousness of the process—imposing their will on the communities that they pretend to represent but do not because they are not democratically elected.

The regional agenda continues to be pursued by a Government who have had it roundly rejected in the north-east. They thought that that would be the area in which an elected regional assembly would be most popular, but it turned out to be deeply unpopular, rejected by 78 per cent. to 22 per cent. None the less, they are continuing to pursue regional structures so that central Government can take more and more decisions away from local communities. If there is one fundamental difference between the Government and the official Opposition, it is that they will carry on creating a regional bureaucracy so that Ministers and officials in Whitehall can impose their decisions on local communities, whereas we will scrap the lot, save the money and give the power back to local communities.

On a more conciliatory note, I shall briefly draw the threads of the debate together. I have not heard one hon. Member speak today who is not concerned about the issues facing their local communities. That includes a desire in all parties for social housing and proper development. I have heard no hon. Member say that they are against development in principle, and I advise the Minister against picking a fight with the Opposition over social housing. I could mention that the Conservative Government had a much better record on building social housing in England than the present Administration, but I will not mention that, because I want to concentrate on what unites us, which is that we are all fundamentally concerned about the same things. What divides us is the constitutional question of who decides.

The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Hall) said that we can solve the problems only if there is leadership, but where does that leadership come from? Does it come from some eagle's lair at the top of a Government Department where a Minister and his officials decide, or do we look to try to create a society in which leadership comes from the local community? I am the first to accept that the trend of removing civic leadership from our communities has a long history, going back a hundred years in which the ability of communities and their elected councils to lead their communities and take decisions has been removed. There are stories of planning applications being turned down by local councils that are then overruled by public inquiry and a Minister's diktat—that is not the way forward. No other country in Europe sets national housing targets or creates a national planning framework in the same way as we do. We live in the most centralised country of all the European states, and if we are going to be—dare I say—a modern country, we need to consider radical decentralisation.

The flaw in the Barker process is glaringly obvious if we consider what it is: a Minister appointing an economist to plan where people should live and what sort of houses they should live in, based on a spurious analysis of the most vague collection of statistics. Not even Stalin would organise his agriculture or tractor production on that basis. Why should we have Gosplan for housing in the south of England and a housing policy based on expanding housing provision in the south and contracting it in the north in order to attract even more economic overheating in the south of England than we have at present? That is the rut that the Government have got themselves into. The next Conservative Government must give power back to local communities so that the society in which we choose to live reflects what our local communities want.

[Mr. Bernard Jenkin]

3.21 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) on securing this extremely helpful debate. Thanks to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, there have been 11 contributions and interventions in a very short time, which is a measure of the importance that hon. Members attach to the issue.

I am sorry that the Conservative spokesman, the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin), decided to have another anti-regional rant. I remind him that the Conservative chair of the East of England regional assembly said that "there will still be a requirement for effective regional planning functions, provision of democratic mandate for the regions and effective scrutiny of other regional bodies—a role in which the assembly and other chambers have shown themselves to be extremely competent."

Mr. Jenkin: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The lady in question was misquoted by the Local Government Chronicle. She wrote to the publication making that point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for me.

Phil Hope: On the fundamental question of who decides, I was a county councillor before becoming a Member of Parliament. I remember the 7 per cent. cut in grants that we had to endure under a Tory Government. There was little decision making, other than on making cuts because of the failure of the Conservative Government to fund local authorities. The £35 billion cuts that the Conservatives announced will decimate council services or push council tax through the roof. I do not need to take lessons from the Conservatives on who decides and on support for local government.

Returning to the Milton Keynes and the south midlands growth area, let me try to deal with the important points raised by hon. Members. First, there has been a thorough democratic process of consultation over the past three or four years. I will not rehearse all the details, but it included an independent study by Roger Tym and Partners in 2002, which made it clear that the area had potential for growth. Other independent growth area assessments were published in 2003 for all the towns where it was recognised that there was potential for growth, including Aylesbury. There was a 12-week period of public consultation, ending in October 2003, on the regional assembly's draft planning document, and the independent panel was appointed to conduct an inquiry and a public examination of all aspects of the proposals. That took place over an unprecedented five weeks during March and April 2004. The independent panel report endorsed growth for Aylesbury and other towns and made recommendations.

The Deputy Prime Minister expects to publish the final sub-regional strategy and alterations to regional planning guidance in the spring. I am trying to point out, in a few seconds, that there has been substantial opportunity for the local authorities and communities in the area to express their concerns before the strategy is finalised. It will then be for local councils to produce detailed proposals to implement a sub-regional strategy through their local development documents. If we left it only to local authorities and did not have a sub-regional strategy, we would not be able to cope with the issue of boundaries between different local authorities. The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) was absolutely right to suggest that we needed a regional or a sub-regional strategy to deal with boundaries and connections between different authorities within the growth area.

It is important that the growth area policy deals with the serious under-provision of housing—no one disagrees with that. Every hon. Member present has said that there is a lack of housing, especially affordable housing, in their constituency because of the high demand. The question is how we solve the problem. Do we let market forces do so, or adopt a planned approach that takes into account the need for sub-regional infrastructure?

Mr. Hopkins: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Phil Hope: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins), because he did not have the opportunity to make a speech.

Mr. Hopkins: Does my hon. Friend accept that the market will not provide the houses that we need in Luton? It will provide large executive homes for people working in London, not thousands of council houses for the people of Luton to live in.

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is right: we are not going to meet the housing needs of the sons and daughters of the constituents represented by the Members of Parliament here today unless we deal with the problems of high demand and a lack of affordable housing.

Mr. Sayeed: Will the Minister give way?

Phil Hope: No. The hon. Gentleman spoke in the debate.

There has been a systemic failure over the past 18 years and it is important that our approach puts that right. The idea that the strategy is only about growth in Milton Keynes and Northampton is clearly wrong. It is absolutely important to have adequate housing, good-quality jobs, and good infrastructure for all areas throughout the sub-region, to ensure that we build sustainable communities. That is the essence of what we are trying to achieve.

I shall pick up on two or three other key points raised in the debate. On health funding, there has been an amazing and important announcement from the Government in the past couple of weeks. There has been excellent news for health planning for my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey), taking into account projected population growth to meet both capital and revenue funding needs. That is an important step forward to ensure that our communities see that the infrastructure—health infrastructure in this case—is there to match the population growth that goes with housing and jobs.

The subject of the environment was highlighted, particularly by the hon. Member for Aylesbury. Let me be clear about that: there was extensive environmental assessment throughout the planning process. Indeed, it was a key feature of the process that I hurriedly sketched out a moment or two ago. The original studies that informed the strategy considered the possible impact of growth on the environment, and a sustainability appraisal was prepared alongside the development of the draft strategy. The five-week period of public examination in March and April last year considered possible impacts on the environment. Crucially, we are committed to protecting our countryside and green spaces. We looked at brownfield sites before greenfield sites and we examined how good design—an important point raised by one of my hon. Friends—and higher densities could reduce the land take of any growth.

We have already met our target of building 60 per cent. of additional or new housing on previously developed land, and densities are increasing in the south-east. It is important to point out that we have added 19,000 hectares of green belt since 1997 in Great Britain: that is a huge contribution. There are some green-belt reviews proposed in Bedfordshire—that is recognised—but if any green belt is lost, an equivalent area of green belt will be required to replace that loss. That is an important part of not allowing the markets to rule, but having a planned approach that delivers what our local communities want.

The hon. Gentleman also described concerns about whether it was fanciful to say that the developer contributions would arrive. The newly created delivery vehicles, such as those operating in Milton Keynes, are working on a more strategic approach to securing section 106 contributions. They are a key element of the planning process, ensuring that we capture from developers and from increases in the value of land opportunities to provide infrastructure. That will be developed in Milton Keynes through a long-term framework. Developers are actively participating in discussions, recognising the benefits of long-term certainty. We look forward to Milton Keynes and other areas realising the benefits of enhanced section 106 contributions towards infrastructure.

I realise that I have not been able to address all the points that hon. Members have raised. We are particularly keen to build sustainable communities. Our aim is not solely housing growth: we shall not repeat the mistakes of the 1960s, or ignore the problems of the 1980s. Our approach will build housing for the sons and daughters of our communities who need somewhere affordable to live, with education, health, and transport infrastructure provided alongside a planned approach to protect and preserve the environment. I believe that that is the best way forward.

Forestry Commission

3.30 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I am very pleased that we have the opportunity today, albeit in a short debate, to discuss the important issue of forestry. I thank the Minister for attending and contributing to the debate. In terms of land use, forestry is probably second only to agriculture. This debate is important and timely given the current Forestry Commission consultation, the quinquennial review of Forest Enterprise and other political parties' proposals to alter the structure of our national forests and how their governing bodies operate.

Forestry has always been important to the UK. When the defence of the realm was dependent on the construction of ships of oak, timber was at a premium and there was always a concern that there was not enough of good enough quality with which to build those ships. It was said at that time that the final contribution that retired admirals could make was to go round with bags of acorns and plant them in the hope that they would grow into trees of the size and quality necessary to build ships. In the first world war, it was regarded strategically that we did not have enough timber to produce pit props and as such the coal production that was necessary for the war effort was being curtailed.

Things have moved on, but forestry is still important. There has been a considerable amount of political upheaval and change and some financial difficulties for the forest industry lately. I welcome the devolution of responsibility to the nations, but even with that we still trade across the borders. One of the most important saw-mills in my constituency—BSW Timber in Newbridge—sources its timber not only from Wales but from throughout the south of England. The policies that the Forestry Commission and Forest Enterprise are operating in England are important for the devolved authorities, too.

Forestry is also an important industry for my constituents, a number of whom are timber producers in the sense that they own forests and woodland, and for those who are involved in extracting and processing timber from those forests. I have, from time to time, heard complaints locally that Forest Enterprise does not operate its business in a way that helps those small businesses on which the rural communities are so dependent. Some of the complaints have been about contracts being offered in very large amounts of more than 5,000 tonnes, which the smaller gangs find it difficult to cope with and which brings in the multinational companies with their more industrialised type of harvesting. Such harvesting may bear down on costs per tonne, but it does not necessarily lead to better quality logs being presented for processing. Some of the smaller saw-mills say that timber is coming to them in a worse condition now than for many years. I will talk more generally about Forest Enterprise in a minute or two.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree that one reason why this is such an important issue in our shared county of Powys is that much of the local economy depends on small and medium-sized businesses, which are disproportionately affected when the large companies come in and effectively squeeze them out of the forestry business?

[Lembit Öpik]

Mr. Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for making those comments, and I associate myself with them. It is sometimes said that Wales is the most efficient spruce factory in the world, as growing conditions are very good. The small companies and businesses in the timber business are very important to supporting the rural communities in England and Wales that they serve.

A great feature that has affected not only Forest Enterprise and the state forest but private timber-growers has been the collapse of commodity prices in recent years. Some of the best logs at roadside would have reached perhaps £55 a cubic metre in the past, but are now selling at roughly £33 a cubic metre. The private and public sectors have had to take account of the reduction in commodity prices.

I welcome the fact that a number of the Baltic nations have realised the recklessness of their activity in the world market, and want to go up a quality and not just compete on price. They are looking again at their trading relationship with Britain and considering whether it can be put on a more commercial basis, instead of their dumping timber in this country at very low prices. I am concerned at some reports from Russia about forests not being managed sustainably. There are reports that certain harvesting has taken place to release cash for people who have come back into land after the fall of communism. Some people have come into private ownership but have no traditional skills in forestry management, and as such have seen the harvesting as a cash benefit. The Government should take countenance of that, and ensure that the timber coming into this country has been produced from sustainable sources.

Given that background, it has been difficult for the Forestry Commission and Forest Enterprise to balance the social and environmental side of their remit with the obvious need for economic viability. I have some sympathy with them; that is not an easy balancing act. I commend much of the work that has gone into producing the public goods—that is, the work that has gone into access, recreation and conservation issues. In light of the recent pronouncement of the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality on the use of mechanically driven vehicles on public footpaths and rights of way, perhaps forest land could be a suitable place for those more intrusive types of recreation.

It is important to note that although current timber prices have hampered both public and private forestry, the UK timber industry comprises producers and processors employing nearly 30,000 people. It is estimated that £2 billion will be invested in saw-mills and paper and board-mills in the next 15 years, and that will add to that employment.

Investment is taking place in my constituency, and the firm involved informs me that it really values the presence of Forest Enterprise, as it guarantees a flow of product into its saw-mills. A number of people question the way in which Forest Enterprise is managed, and I have no doubt that suggestions will have been made. Some have suggested to me that Forest Enterprise should be privatised, and could be run better by private individuals or companies. When the UK Forest Products Association met recently, it certainly reinforced the view that Forest Enterprise plays a valued role in providing continuity of supply of commodity and therefore enables saw-mills and other processors to plan their investment on the basis that they have assured throughput. That is the conclusion that I have come to, too.

The social and environmental benefits of forests are clear. Research carried out for the Woodland Trust in its report, "Making Woodland Count: its Contribution to our Quality of Life", shows that forest areas meet 11 of the 15 Government headline quality-of-life indicators for sustainable development. They provide opportunities for recreation, wildlife and physical activity, which are so important to making our young people fit and healthy.

It is also important to consider UK forestry in economic terms. It is right that the Forestry Commission is partially funded through the sale of timber from public forests. However, it is important that Forest Enterprise takes into account the effect that its sales will have on the market price for domestic timber producers. Given the already depressed state of timber markets, it is vital that the market price is not adversely affected by sales from Forest Enterprise that are designed to balance its own books. It is important that efficiency is not confused with the over-simplistic goal of turning a short-term profit or short-term cash flow. The criticism has been put to me that Forest Enterprise has been going into stands that are not mature—not ready for felling—and as a result producing timber of not very good quality, which further depresses the commodity price.

The Forestry Commission has recently increased its emphasis and spending on non-core business activities while neglecting, some would say, its core business of timber production. It must consider commercial timber production as a key element, because we will not be able to finance the public goods unless the core business is profitable. The situation that I have described is down to the direction of Government. I support the intentions of the policy, but its implementation has sometimes been counter-productive. It is vital that a real commitment remains to supporting domestic commercial forestry, as that is the surest way of achieving the social and environmental aims of the Forestry Commission.

I welcome the proposals to reform the powers of the Forestry Commission. The strengthening of ties with the private and voluntary sectors is vital for the health of the industry. That will allow for the provision of public goods, rather than leaving the fate of the industry to depressed timber prices. The issue of restocking orders is also important for sustainable practice. I draw the Minister's attention to the excellent work carried out in that regard by the Welsh Minister for Rural Development in 2003. He made the important point that the quality of restocking should be considered with particular emphasis on the expansion of ancient woodland, especially in areas where that would have a direct effect on local communities.

Having said that, I have heard criticisms about the proposals to have at least 50 per cent. of land in continuous cover—that is, people do not go in and clear-fell but have trees of different age groups in a plantation. This issue is of great importance. We believe that rushing into that will have a deleterious effect on the quantity of timber produced and the continuity of supply, so we would like it to be considered again.

In the few minutes remaining to me, I shall outline the Liberal Democrat proposals for the future of Government involvement in forestry in the UK. That can have only limited scope in the recommendations for Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales. First, it is vital that a viable and sustainable public forestry service is maintained. That not only preserves the valuable public assets of woodlands and forests but benefits the industry as a whole—processors and saw-mills. The role of the service should encompass acting as a facilitator to private forest concerns through the grants system operated by the Forestry Commission and through the responsible activities of Forest Enterprise. Short-term losses should not lead to panic decision making; rather, it is through considered strategic thinking that the Forestry Commission will best serve the needs of the industry and the public.

Timber growing and processing is vital to the economy of the UK, but it is also important for communities and the environment. Competitiveness is compatible with sustainability, and the Government should be playing their part in ensuring that the forestry in this country achieves that.

3.44 pm

Lord Commissioner of Her Majesty's Treasury (Mr. Nick Ainger): I congratulate the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) on securing this debate. We do not often have debates on forestry or the Forestry Commission, and I hope that I can address some of the points that he raised.

In the hon. Gentleman's opening remarks, he touched on the history of the Forestry Commission and how it developed originally from a wartime need over many centuries to provide wood for our ships. When the commission was established in 1919, the commissioners were charged with the general duty of promoting the interests of forestry, the development of afforestation and the production and supply of timber. Later, a general duty of promoting the establishment and management in Great Britain of adequate reserves of growing trees was added to the commissioners' duties.

In 1967, the Forestry Act consolidated previous legislation and is the basis of the Forestry Commission's activities today. It was not until only 20 years ago that the commissioners were required to achieve a reasonable balance between the creation of new forests, the management of existing forests, the production and supply of timber and, most importantly, the conservation and enhancement of natural beauty and the conservation of our natural environment. After more than 60 years of focus on timber supply, the commission had a duty to change, which it has embraced with ever-increasing enthusiasm. Today, the Forestry Commission, in both organisational and activity terms, is unrecognisable from what it was only 20 years ago. I know that some people are still trying to catch up with the dramatic change that has been made.

The woodland resource created in the last century now has the capacity through enlightened management to deliver a wide range of social, economic and environmental benefits and make a positive contribution to sustainable development. The pace of change has increased, and today forestry is a devolved issue, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned. The Forestry Commission is responsible separately to Ministers in England, Scotland and Wales, and collectively on Great British functions. The current structure of the commission reflects those changes.

Much of the commission's work is with private woodland owners, to whom it provides grants and advice, but a significant part of its work is delivered by the commission's Forest Enterprise agency. More than three quarters of the commission's staff based in England work for Forest Enterprise, and the agency is the manager or steward of the national forest estate. It is a unique national asset. Its current range of activities vividly illustrates how much it has evolved, and I will give some examples of how it has developed.

The agency is England's largest provider of countryside recreational opportunities. It offers a vast range of activities, from open access for walkers and cyclists on all its freehold land to activities such as horse riding and motor rallying in selected woodlands. Forest Enterprise manages more than 100 self-catering cabins in woodland sites, which make a significant contribution to local economies. In 17 campsites across England, it provides nearly 5,000 pitches, generating additional income of more than £2 million a year.

The cabins at Keldy in the north york moors have recently received a major facelift in Forest Enterprise's largest ever investment in recreation. Some 62 superb new cabins are equipped to top-quality self-catering standards and built from sustainably produced timber, over half of which was grown in the UK. They will provide an additional 50,000 bed nights each year, as well as contributing £1.5 million to the local economy.

The business overall is profitable. In 2002-03, it showed a net surplus of nearly £800,000 and earned a real rate of return on capital invested of 8.5 per cent. In 2003-04, the surplus rose to £1.3 million. The commission is now developing a public-private partnership that will ensure that the returns on the investment can be sustained at no cost to the taxpayer. However, it is not only in fields of recreation and leisure that Forest Enterprise has been playing a leading role. The public forest estate has been independently certified for sustainable timber production. Indeed, it was the first state forest service anywhere in the world to have its operations certified in that way.

Enhancing biodiversity has equal importance to timber production. Great efforts are being made to improve the ancient woodland on the estate and to bring all 41,000 hectares of sites of special scientific interest on the public forest estate into favourable condition. That was the point that the hon. Gentleman was making about clear-felling. Clearly, different management systems are now required to meet the aims and obligations. In England, clear-felling and continuous forestry systems have their place, but they should be site-specific. The precise choice is for the managers in the region, taking account of the relevant environment gains and standards.

The process of dedicating the whole of the freehold national forest estate to public access under the provisions in the Countryside and Rights of Way Act

[Mr. Nick Ainger]

2000 is under way, and will be completed next year. That will help to ensure that public access will continue to be available in perpetuity. However, it is not just in our countryside that the Commission's expertise is providing real benefits. It has also been very active in delivering social, environmental and economic benefits for our towns and cities. It is at the forefront of work to restore former industrial land, and to create a green infrastructure for future developments.

There have been good examples of this new role in three of the 12 community forests. In Thames Chase to the east of London, in the Red Rose forest near Manchester and in the Mersey forest, a £9 million Treasury-funded capital modernisation fund project has enabled Forest Enterprise to create 1,300 hectares of new woodland. Forest Enterprise has bought land, planted trees and created footpaths through the new woodland. Local people have enthusiastically played their part, helping to design and develop the new woodland. There are many more similar projects right across England.

If the commission is to continue to be an effective delivery body, it needs to operate within clearly defined policy frameworks. In our rural strategy, published last year, we made a commitment to transfer responsibility for strategic forestry policy in England to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and that has now been done. That is allowing the Forestry Commission to broaden its responsibilities as the lead delivery body for forestry; that includes taking on responsibility for community forestry and the farm woodland premium scheme.

The new forestry policy unit in DEFRA will act as an advocate for forestry in Government, contributing to all the cross-cutting policies in which forestry does, or could, play a part. One of the first tasks of the policy unit will be to undertake a review of the England forestry strategy that we published in 1998. The strategy set out a five to 10-year vision of our priorities and programmes for forestry and has been a very successful framework for support for forestry in England. However, with the changing policy and delivery landscape, now is an ideal time to refresh the strategy. The new forestry policy unit and the commission will work closely with each other.

We are not, however, looking at forestry in isolation. One of the key elements of the draft Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill, published two weeks ago, is the establishment of an integrated agency to help protect and improve our natural resources. The commission will become a close working partner of the new agency, ensuring that there is a comprehensive and coherent approach to land management, whether woodland or not. That alignment of the Forestry Commission will build on the success of partnerships that the commission has established with English Nature, the Countryside Agency and the rural development service.

The Forestry Commission provides grant support for the management of existing woodlands and the creation of new woodlands through the woodland grant scheme. Owing to exceptional demand the commission closed the scheme to new applicants in June last year, and an additional £3 million of funding for the current year was announced last October on top of the £18.5 million already in place. The success of the scheme means that more than 24,000 hectares of new woodland was established between April 2000 and March 2004. The Forestry Commission is well on the road to meeting the England rural development programme target of 30,000 hectares of new woodland in the seven-year period ending in 2006. The replacement England woodland grant scheme is expected to open for applications in July and will provide a framework for the delivery of public benefits through incentives for the stewardship of existing woodland and the creation of new woodland.

The hon. Gentleman made a couple of points about timber markets and imports, and it has been suggested that Forestry Commission timber production is depressing the timber market for private growers. The Forestry Commission regularly publishes production forecasts and details of its planned production. That assured supply has been one reason for continued investment in the UK processing sector. One of the hon. Gentleman's points was that that supply is seen by many producers, particularly processors, as the basis for their investment and future investment. About 85 per cent. of the UK's wood supply comes from imports. Timber from UK sources has to remain competitive with those imports, which could easily increase. That means that the world market, and not the level of Forestry Commission production, sets prices for UK-grown timber.

By their very nature, the economics of forestry arouse a great interest in many people. It is a complex area in terms of assessing the relative costs and benefits, which are often interdependent. That is the nature of multi-purpose forestry—action taken to implement one objective frequently delivers benefits for many objectives. They are complex matters that I cannot do justice to in this debate. In April 2003, an economic analysis of forestry policy was commissioned by DEFRA and the Treasury. I will arrange for a copy of the final report to be sent to the hon. Gentleman and for copies to be placed in the Library.

We have a sustainable procurement policy supported by the UK Timber Trade Federation, which implements a responsible purchasing policy through its members. I am pleased to note that all Forestry Commission woods are certified together with an increasing number of owners' woodlands. We estimate that more than 70 per cent. of all wood produced from UK forests is now certified, and 50 per cent. of the output from UK saw-mills is also certified. That independently verified assurance of their sustainable management provides a real advantage in the competitive marketplace.

Mr. Roger Williams: I thank the Minister for the points that he is making. However, it is sometimes said to me by timber growers that certification is an expense: it produces public goods but little economic benefit for the timber producer, because people pay nothing more for it. As there is a public good, would the Government consider subsidising or paying for certification of private woodlands?

Mr. Ainger: As the hon. Gentleman knows, there are various farm assurance schemes for agriculture, which are in the interests of the producer. The Government do not subsidise farm assurance schemes, and I cannot see their subsidising timber production at this stage.

The hon. Gentleman raised a good point about the size of contracts for felling and clearing timber. I know that the issue is being examined, and I will bring his comments to the attention of the chief executive to see whether we can make further improvement and make smaller contracts available for smaller, local businesses.

The Forestry Commission has a long and varied history, throughout which it has demonstrated that it delivers the policy priorities of the day. As the needs of society have changed, so has the role and structure of the Forestry Commission. As we enter an exciting period for delivery of rural policy, with the publication of the draft Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill, I am sure that the Forestry Commission will continue to adapt to the changing demands placed on it, and I am equally sure that it will continue to deliver good value for our country.

International Criminal Tribunal (Former Yugoslavia)

4 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): I asked for this debate for three main reasons. When the tribunal was established, I was firmly of the view that it would not heal wounds or bring people together. On the contrary, I thought that it would drive communities in the former Yugoslavia further apart, that it would be conducted on a low threshold of evidence and that it would pit neighbour against neighbour.

I have travelled extensively in the former Yugoslavia, before the various wars and since. I took a great interest in the truth and reconciliation commission established in South Africa. My second reason for securing the debate is that it seems to me that after something as vile and vicious as apartheid, or as vicious as a civil war, such a commission is more likely to succeed than a criminal tribunal.

My third reason for asking for the debate is that it is time to draw a line under the tribunal at The Hague and allow individual countries to arrest, charge and punish their citizens if they believe that they have committed crimes against the community. I notice that the occupying coalition in Iraq, led by the United States, has decided to allow the Iraqi people to try Saddam Hussein and his former Government; there are to be no charges against the warlords and no tribunals in Afghanistan. Yugoslavia seems to be singled out for this kind of treatment, and one must ask why. The United States was one of the main countries to set up the tribunal, and it gives the tribunal money, yet it refuses to sign up to the International Criminal Court. So a lot of double standards hang around the issue.

I have followed the tribunal at The Hague very closely. It is my belief that it delivers a biased system of justice and that the decisions taken by the chief prosecutor are largely based on the nationality of the accused, rather than on what evidence there is against them. In short, the tribunal has turned out as I said it would: it is a victors' court, set up mainly to punish one nationality—the Serbs.

A few years ago, I visited the tribunal with Mark Littman QC, a Serbian colleague who opposed, as I did, the illegal bombing of Yugoslavia. I am pleased to say that we were granted an interview with Carla del Ponte, the chief prosecutor. We were able to raise some of our concerns about how the indictments had been issued and why there was such emphasis on the Serbs. After all, there had been a civil war in Yugoslavia. When I went to The Hague, I had just returned from Croatia, where I had been looking at the plight of Serb returnees. We were shown mass graves there. In Operation Storm, there had been a lot of fighting; the Croatian army had driven out about 200,000 Serbs, and that was the first mass ethnic cleansing of the various wars. I was very up to date on what had gone on there, and I raised the issue of the mass graves with the prosecutor. We took photographs that matched up with the people who were missing. Carla del Ponte was not interested and said that she was short of resources.

I also raised the issue of Nasser Oric. With another organisation—not the NATO Parliamentary Assembly—I went to the siege of Sarajevo and visited not only the Muslim areas but some of the predominantly Serb villages. All the evidence there was about Oric and his raiding band, and how they had killed lots of people. He was, by any standards, a war criminal and there were videotapes and lots of evidence. Members of this House who went to the same area also know that. The chief prosecutor said that she had no plans to indict him and would not discuss the issue. However, she admitted that the whereabouts of that man were known. Only now, in the face of overwhelming protests and as a result of people putting evidence forward, has he been arrested. He has now been sent for trial at The Hague, but until then he had led rather a pleasant life. I think that there were double standards operating in that case.

[Mrs. Alice Mahon]

In the same year I visited Banja Luka with the NATO Parliamentary Assembly. I was chair of the sub-committee at that time. We talked to many people and, in particular, to a policeman who worked for the chief prosecutor at The Hague. Interestingly, the policeman came from Preston, in the north of England, not very far from where I live. When he was questioned closely he told us that he had instructions to go after Serb war criminals only. Moreover, on the wall of the office of the prosecutor at The Hague—she is supposed to be impartial and to look for war criminals from every ethnic group in the former Yugoslavia—there was a big cartoon showing Serb criminals wanted for war crimes. Those war criminals probably do need to end up in The Hague, or being tried in their own country, but it seemed to us that the prosecutor showed an overwhelming bias.

We asked about the crimes of one or two of the Kosovo Albanians—Hashim Thaci, Agim Ceku and Ramush Haradinaj, who is now the Prime Minister of Kosovo—but no indictments have been published for them. Everyone agrees that those people took part in some very unpleasant practices during the bombing of Yugoslavia; newspaper articles are written about it, and no one bothers to deny it.

The Croatian general, Gotovina, has recently made it known that he has no intention of surrendering himself to the tribunal at The Hague, although he is willing to appear in Zagreb and be questioned by the tribunal. It is clear that there are laws for some participants in the civil war and not for others. Let us imagine the outcry if Belgrade had hung on for so long to a war criminal or an indicted person who was living openly in Belgrade or one of the other cities. Let us imagine what would have been said in a case similar to that of the general.

The more closely one examines the decisions taken by the chief prosecutor and the conduct of the hearings at the tribunal, the more it becomes clear that the tribunal is not a triumph for law and justice. It is a court founded by the west, funded largely by the west, and staffed at very senior levels by the west.

Many senior professors of law and others take the same view as me; I shall quote only one of them because I have so much material from people who share my view. Robert M. Hayden, from the Woodrow Wilson International Centre for Scholars, in the United States, commented, in relation to the tribunals, on the "failure of the ICTY Prosecutor to indict NATO leaders for the use of cluster bombs. This prosecutorial standard was set in July 1995, when Milan Martic, president of the self-proclaimed Serb Republic in Croatia, was indicted for violations of the laws and customs of war on the grounds that he had ordered the May 1995 missile attack on Zagreb."

He continues:

"According to the indictment, what made the bombardment a war crime was that the missiles had been fitted with cluster warheads. Seven civilians were killed and many more wounded, and damage was done to a home for the aged and to a children's hospital.

Why, then, have there been no indictments of NATO's May 7 attack on the city of Nis, where cluster bombs fell on the market, killing fifteen people, and hitting also the city's main hospital? It is not acceptable to say that NATO was only aiming at military targets and missed; after all, Martic maintained that he was aiming at military targets in Zagreb . . . While the Prosecutor says that Martic targeted cities intentionally, this is also true of NATO generals, especially the American ones, who were even complaining that French politicians did not permit them to attack more sites in Yugoslav cities."

I stood on the last bridge over the Danube—the railway bridge—at Novi Sad the night before it was bombed by NATO. That was a civilian target, because the bridges bring water supplies and other things across to the other half of the city. There was no doubt that that was deliberately targeted by NATO—it took out all the bridges. I visited the Crvena Zastava car and tractor factory and spoke to the workers just a few days after they had been bombed. That civilian target was hit by 21 cruise missiles. Many people were injured and I have photographs in which there is blood on the floor from the sit-in. The workers did not want to be bombed and they sent their stated position to every country in NATO. I do not know how they survived—people were only injured and not dead—because it was such a complete mess after the bombardment. From my hotel bedroom window I watched NATO bomb the oil refinery at Pancevo. I visited people who were grieving for colleagues who died. There are no charges against NATO for any of these offences. NATO took action that did not have the approval of the United Nations.

In late 1999 the tribunal prosecutor said that she was investigating NATO's conduct during the Kosovo war, including the question of the use of cluster bombs, but within days she produced a preliminary document that to my knowledge has never been published—and I have been trying to get hold of it. There was a press release, of which Robert M. Hayden said:

"The prosecutor had said that if the report indicated that NATO broke the Geneva conventions she would indict those responsible; however, four days later she issued a press release stating that NATO is 'not under investigation by the Office of the Prosecutor . . . There is no formal inquiry into the actions of NATO during the conflict.'"

It was never going to happen. Carla del Ponte, like her predecessor the Canadian, Louise Arbour, is a creature of NATO. Just listen to what Jamie Shea, the official press officer, said in answer to a question about NATO's liability for war crimes before the court at The Hague:

"NATO is the friend of the Tribunal. NATO countries are those that have provided the finances to set up the Tribunal, we are among the majority financiers."

The ICTY was set up to try to convict Serbs. Serbs resisted the western Governments who had taken sides.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): Does the hon. Lady agree that whatever the motives for setting up the tribunal, it is now perceived in the region—particularly in Serbia—as more of a hindrance to advancing democracy, because of the feeling of victimisation?

Mrs. Mahon: I certainly do agree with that, and I will be coming to that. The decision was taken that the Serbs had to be punished collectively and that a veneer of legality would be provided by—in my view—an incompetent tribunal, not one where justice is handed out freely and fairly. If the people in South Africa, Iraq and Afghanistan can try their own people, why cannot the people of the former Yugoslavia do exactly the same?

I turn briefly to the ongoing trial of Mr. Milosevic, and note that paragraph 58 of the newly produced Foreign Affairs Committee report on the western Balkans says:

"we also heard that the badly run Milosevic trial permitted the former leader to present himself as a martyr for Serbia."

Whether he does that or not, I agree with the comments about the trial being badly run; anybody who follows those events will be horrified.

Mr. Milosevic wants to conduct his own trial. The right for somebody to conduct their own defence is a basic right in all our national systems, it is identified as a basic human right in most international conventions and it is explicitly granted in the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. There is a precedent for imposing legal counsel when people are so violent that they would disrupt proceedings. However, there is no precedent for imposing legal counsel for ill health. Mr. Stephen Kay, the British lawyer, has tried to get himself dismissed, but has now been imposed by the court. The whole matter has developed into a farce.

Mr. Milosevic, who has been preparing his case for almost two years, will not co-operate with Mr. Kay. Most witnesses refuse to co-operate with what they regard as a fraudulent process. However, Mr. Stephen Kay, despite voicing misgivings about conducting a case against a client's will, has accepted a position of imposed counsel. Mr. Milosevic has been preparing his case with the help of two legal advisers. He has now seen the whole case handed over to a British lawyer who was not involved in the preparation. The timetable is tight. It was an unlimited timetable for the prosecution, but not for the defence. What kind of justice can anyone expect when such legal chicanery is allowed in a court to which we have put our name?

The agony for the Serbs is continuing. I have looked briefly at today's Foreign Affairs Committee report. On page 27, under the heading of "Co-operation with The Hague Tribunal", it refers to criticism once again of the Government of Serbia. I desperately want the whole region to be regenerated. I want a good, safe democratic future for all the people who live in the former Yugoslavia. The tribunal in The Hague is a festering sore at the heart of Yugoslavia. It is preventing any progress from being made for all its people.

I wish to quote Professor Jianming Shen at St. John's university in Canada. He argues that the tribunal system

"is a lopsided one. Whom to indict, when to indict, and what evidence to collect and use, are all under the control of one single individual"— in my view, a very incompetent and biased individual—

"and there is no checking and review mechanism except for the judges of the chambers of the Tribunal who in theory may reject a prosecution."

He concludes that the tribunal should not be placed in the hands of one prosecutor and goes on to suggest ways in which that could be overcome. I want a complete end to this process.

The cost of administering the tribunal is absolutely staggering. The 2004-05 budget was nearly $3[illegible] million. For incompetence and bias, the countries in the west are paying out such money. Let us just consider how much better that money could be spent regenerating the area. It should go into Serbia, Montenegro, Macedonia and Kosovo, where people have been without electricity in some of the Serb villages for a couple of months. People are still being murdered there. It still has a war criminal that the tribunal refuses to indict. Much better use could have been made of the money. It could have rebuilt the bridges over the Danube that were destroyed deliberately. It could rebuild some of the hospitals.

I spent the weekend in Brussels with the NATO Parliamentary Assembly. I was surprised and a little shocked when, on receiving a report on Afghanistan, senior NATO politicians and members of the military, discussing the warlords, the poppy trade and opium, said that, for the good of Afghanistan, there must be no trials, but that they must bring in the warlords. They said that those people had committed mass murders and killed thousands, and that they must be brought into the civic and political process. The double standards when applied to Serbia and Montenegro are absolutely breathtaking.

The tribunal should be abolished and then all the people of Yugoslavia could start to heal the wounds that separate them. The children are now being punished. The next generation will have to bear the guilt. Let us ensure that the children—the young people—can take their place in the heart of Europe where they belong.

4.20 pm

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) on securing the debate and on raising this important subject today.

This year marks the 10th anniversary of the Dayton accords and the end of the bloodiest conflict in the former Yugoslav Federation. We should remember that in the past 10 years so much has changed for the better. Free and fair elections have been held throughout the region, large-scale conflict no longer threatens and the European Union and other international partners are united in working with the region to maintain stability and create prosperity. The dark days of the early 1990s thankfully now seem a distant memory.

However, a shadow remains and will do so as long as the truth is suppressed and denied. It is cast by the war crimes committed during the bloody conflicts in the early 1990s and it will not be removed until those responsible for the appalling atrocities committed during the conflict are held to account. That is why the United Kingdom remains a firm supporter of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. We will continue to lend our political, financial and practical support for an efficient tribunal that can deliver effective justice for the thousands of victims who suffered so much during the conflict.

[Mr. Douglas Alexander]

At the same time, we recognise concerns about the operation of the tribunal, in particular its cost, slowness and geographical distance from the victims. Others have alleged, as we have heard today, that it is biased against Serbs. I will seek to address those questions. The tribunal has so far cost United Nations member states some $860 million since its inception in 1993, of which the UK's share is some $54 million. We have taken a close interest in the efficient management of the tribunal and will continue our policy of bearing down on its costs.

However, we must recognise that international justice is an expensive process. The complexity and nature of the cases before the tribunal make them inherently expensive. Cases arising from three separate conflicts are being prosecuted and indictees often face multiple counts. The Lockerbie trial, by way of comparison, cost UK taxpayers some £60 million.

Mr. Randall: I hear what the Minister is saying, but will he explain why a similar tribunal has not been set up for Iraq? Why is Saddam Hussein to be tried by his own people?

Mr. Alexander: It is fair to say that the basis on which the actions were taken, the nature of the conflicts and the circumstances of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia and Iraq are fundamentally different. The consequences for the judicial processes that follow on from that conflict reflect the fact that there are very different circumstances in Iraq and Yugoslavia.

Mrs. Mahon: The Minister will be aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd), who is now the special envoy on human rights to Iraq, chaired an organisation, Indict, which collected evidence for years with the express view of having such a tribunal. Now that prospect is gone. Why?

Mr. Alexander: I maintain the position that the Government have advanced: assistance is being rendered to the Iraqi authorities in bringing forward a proper system of judicial authority, which will allow in turn for prosecutions to take place, not least in relation to Saddam Hussein. I return to the substantive point that I am conscious that the issue of Iraq has divided both this Chamber and some within our party. However, it is only common sense to recognise that there are distinctive circumstances at work in the former Yugoslavia and in Iraq, which gave rise to the action that was taken.

On fugitives from justice, we have made clear our belief that the ICTY should plan its work within the deadlines that it has set out. However, its progress is also clearly subject to factors outside its control, the most important of which is co-operation from states in the region in apprehending fugitive indictees, and providing access to documents and witnesses. The president and prosecutor have both made it clear that lack of such co-operation will affect the tribunal's final closure date. We take that lack of co-operation extremely seriously and will take action to support the tribunal. There can be no closure until all the accused have been brought to The Hague to face trial.

Many of the accused have voluntarily surrendered and pleaded guilty; others have been tried and sentenced. Three individuals stand accused of ordering and orchestrating the most serious crimes: Ratko Mladic, Radovan Karadzic and Ante Gotovina. They remain fugitives from justice. The charges against Mladic and Karadzic include the massacre at Srebrenica where more than 7,000 Muslim men and boys were killed in cold blood because, in the views of those who perpetrated the action, they held the wrong religious beliefs. Their refusal to surrender, while others face trial, is shameful.

Even worse is the refusal of the relevant authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Serbia and Montenegro to take all possible steps to secure their arrest. We have welcomed recent transfers of lower-level indictees and provided co-operation at a bureaucratic level, but there remains in the Serb body politic a refusal to face up to the past. That has tragic consequences for the people of Serbia and Montenegro and Bosnia. Their future prosperity is held hostage by a few fugitives and by their elected representatives' refusal to grasp the nettle and accept their international legal and moral obligations.

The authorities in Belgrade and Banja Luka are not alone. Croatia is on the cusp of an historic step: opening accession negotiations with the European Union. As a champion of enlargement, the United Kingdom is committed to helping all the countries of the western Balkans to take their rightful place within Europe, but that cannot be at the expense of political conditionality. All countries, including our own, are under an obligation to co-operate fully with the tribunal.

Since gaining candidate status last June, the Croatian authorities have failed to satisfy the chief prosecutor that they are doing everything they possibly can to locate and apprehend the fugitive general, Ante Gotovina. The European Council conclusions in December 2004 made it clear that accession negotiations could begin only when the authorities were co-operating fully with The Hague. However, the Croatian Government seem unwilling to meet their obligations. Instead they indulge in cosmetic measures and public relations campaigns in the hope that negotiations will begin anyway. We continue to make it clear that they need to take action now to enable negotiations to begin in March. The importance of conditionality policy and the tribunal is not just about Gotovina, Karadzic or Mladic; it is about the rule of law, about European norms of behaviour and about these countries' willingness to confront the past in order to be able to face the future.

The tribunal has brought a sense of justice to many thousands of victims across the region, guaranteeing that their suffering is acknowledged and not ignored. More than 3,500 witnesses have had the chance to tell their stories while testifying in court. For many, though not all, that has helped the process of personal closure.

As we heard in the debate, the tribunal has been criticised by some for concentrating more on one ethnic group—the Bosnian Serbs—than any other. However, it is important to remember that the indictments are against individuals, not groups. The emphasis on individual responsibility dispels any notion of collective punishment of the Serbs as a group, as has been suggested.

The tribunal's influence will continue after its closure. It will have left an historic record of the atrocities and of jurisprudence. It is not possible for the tribunal to hear every case against every individual, but its experience will be an invaluable resource for the regional courts, such as the special war crimes chamber of the Bosnian state court, which will continue to prosecute suspected war criminals. Together with its sister tribunal, the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, it will leave a legacy of ground-breaking case law, which is already proving an important resource for the newly established International Criminal Court.

The international community has learned valuable lessons from the International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda. They are likely to be the last tribunals of their kind. More recent tribunals, such as the special court for Sierra Leone, are smaller and more tightly focused in terms of the number of indictees and counts, which makes for a much shorter lifespan and much lower costs.

For the future, the United Kingdom will work together with like-minded partners for the widest possible jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court so that we can ensure that there is no impunity for those who commit the most serious violations of international humanitarian law and crimes against humanity. The court, which the UK regards as a milestone in the development of international justice, was founded in part to avoid the need to set up such ad hoc tribunals as that in Yugoslavia. We believe that over time the permanent court will develop into a powerful deterrent against would-be perpetrators of the most heinous crimes, which it is the shared responsibility of the international community to punish.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Four o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 24 February 2005

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

Migration and Development

[Relevant documents: Sixth Report from the International Development Committee Session 2003–04 HC79-I and the Government's response thereto, First Special Report Session 2004–05 HC 163.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Margaret Moran.]

2.30 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The International Development Committee is grateful for the opportunity to debate the report, not least because it gives a further opportunity to draw it and the Government's response to the attention of the House. This, as with every other report of the International Development Committee, is a unanimous report, and every recommendation is unanimous. If there were to be a headline, or for those who will read no further in Hansard, it would convey that we concluded:

"Migration and migrants should not be seen as problems to be dealt with. Migration presents both challenges and opportunities. Migrants are people trying to improve their lives and must be treated accordingly."

I hope that many hon. Members will read our report, because quite a lot of what we have to say may be counter-intuitive and perhaps not what people expect. I think that we exposed several myths about migration. The history of migration is the history of people's struggle to survive and prosper, to escape insecurity and poverty and to move in response to opportunity. When I considered how best to summarise the report for this debate it occurred to me that I could do no better than to share with the House the published summary:

"Migration is not a panacea for development problems, but properly managed it can deliver major benefits in development and poverty reduction."

The summary mentions that global flows of aid amount to just under $70 billion a year, and continues:

"The United Nations estimates that the Millennium Development Goals could be met if aid were increased to $100 billion a year. A slight relaxation of restrictions on the movement of workers—increasing the proportion of migrants in the workforce of developed countries to 3 per cent.—would deliver global gains of perhaps $150 billion a year."

Why? Because

"remittances sent home by international migrants through official channels currently amount to $93 billion a year; with informal transfers included, remittances are likely to amount to around $300 billion a year. Migration delivers massive economic gains, which could be used for poverty reduction.

The costs and benefits of migration are distributed, unevenly, between and within countries and social groups. The balance and distribution of costs and benefits depends upon the nature of the migration in question, and on the links which migration establishes between places of origin and destination. This report shows how governments and others could—by shaping the nature of migration and the distribution of its costs and benefits—make migration work for the poor."

There are, however, several migration myths, which we should like to dispel. Myth No. 1 is that migration and migrants are problems to be dealt with. That is wrong. First, migration presents both challenges and opportunities. In their determination to deal with the challenges, Governments must not miss the opportunities. Secondly, migrants are not problems. They are people trying to improve their lives, and must be treated accordingly.

Myth No. 2 is that there is a tidal wave of migrants about to crash upon our shores. That is wrong. Migration is hugely important—economically and politically—because of the links that it establishes between countries, but it remains the exception rather than the rule. International migration has increased over the past 40 years, but still only 2.9 per cent. of the world's population are international migrants.

Myth No. 3 is that migration is primarily about people moving from developing countries to developed countries. That is also wrong. Most migration takes place within and between developing countries. Fully 40 per cent. of international migrants move between poor countries, and the number of migrants who stay in their own country far exceeds that of international migrants. To compare, there are 175 million international migrants, whereas India alone has 200 million internal migrants and China 120 million. As regards refugees, two thirds live in developing countries and more than one third live in the least developed countries.

Myth No. 4 is that it is the poorest, most desperate people who migrate. That is also wrong. The poorest people often lack the resources to migrate; if they do migrate, they are likely to move locally. That obviously has major implications for policy. First, it cannot be assumed that policies to help migrants, particularly international migrants, will also help the poorest people. Secondly, migration will not necessarily be stemmed by lifting people out of poverty. Nevertheless, improvements to governance in developing countries can reduce people's motivation to leave, and the encouragement of remittances and return can make the migration that occurs more development-friendly.

The fifth and last of those myths is that migration harms the prospects of developing countries by causing a brain drain. The response to that is that it does not necessarily do so. Migration can lead to a brain drain that harms the prospects of developing countries, but whether it does so depends on the nature of that migration, and the links that it establishes between host and home countries. Flows of remittances and other resources and the return of migrants with new skills can offset the loss of migrants, and may even lead to a "brain gain".

In our report, having dispelled those myths, we then tried to make it clear how to make migration work for poverty reduction. We did that through the examination of migration journeys. Each stage of the migration journey offers entry points for policy, through which Governments—in the United Kingdom and other developed and developing countries, and at multilateral level—can make migration work for poverty reduction.

Rich countries must not exacerbate the problems of the brain drain for poor countries. International recruitment—including that of nurses and teachers, about which I shall say more later—must be better regulated. The push factors that lead to migration from developing countries must be addressed. The opportunities for mutually beneficial arrangements—triple wins—for migrants, migrant-sending and migrant-receiving countries should be explored.

[Tony Baldry]

In relation to travelling, arriving and living, more effort must be put into tackling trafficking in people, smuggling and illegal migration. Decisions about migrant status must be taken fairly and quickly. Migrants must be enabled to live productive lives. The Governments in host societies must ensure that migrants are not denied access to services, that migrants' integration into host societies is supported, and that migrants' rights are protected.

With respect to returning, reintegrating and circulating, flexible systems of temporary and circular migration, and ways of making return sustainable should be established. If such schemes are to deliver development benefits, development stakeholders must be fully involved in their design.

We also considered the matter of resource flows; remittances and the role of the diaspora. Governments and others can shape and use the links that migration establishes between home and host societies. Such links include remittances and the diaspora, two areas to which we paid particular attention. The onus is on policy makers to encourage the flow of remittances, to reduce the costs that migrants have to pay to send money home and to improve the investment climate in developing countries so that remittances can be used productively and in ways that reduce poverty. The diaspora and its members can be important agents of development. Governments have much to learn from deeper engagement with the diaspora, its members and its constituent organisations. The diaspora should be involved in discussions on development strategies, voluntary remittance schemes and sustainable development.

The Department for International Development and Ministers told us that the debate on migration and development is at the stage where the trade and development debate was 10 years ago. People are beginning to say that there is a development dimension to migration, but there is a lack of joined-up thinking at national and international levels and some resistance to connecting the issues. We share that analysis and hope that our work, our report and DFID's commendable efforts will ensure that it does not take another 10 years to reach the same stage as we are at now with trade and development.

I was glad to see that the Government stated in their response to our report that "The Committee's report has a wealth of practical suggestions and observations that will feed into DFID's evolving work in this area, and also emphasises the importance of cross-Whitehall working to maximise the very real benefits that can accrue from well-managed migration policies."

As the Government rightly observe:

"The challenge is to make the most of migration by minimising the costs for developed and developing countries alike, as well as for migrants themselves."

We had a large number of conclusions, 61 in all. I do not intend to go through them all, but I would like to draw the Chamber's attention to a few.

Our first conclusion is that policies aimed at delivering development and poverty reduction should not start from the assumption that migration is a rare occurrence, a south-north phenomenon or a one-off event. Policies need to be based on an understanding of the multi-faceted nature of migration, including temporary, circular and seasonal migration within and between developing countries as well as from south to north. I have already drawn the Chamber's attention, for example, to circular migration in countries such as India and China.

Policy makers must pay careful attention to the experiences and concerns of female migrants to ensure that their migration is beneficial. As the poorest do not migrate or do not migrate far, it cannot be assumed that policies that help migrants will also help the poor. That is a dilemma for those who would like migration management to reduce migration; developed countries cannot expect to solve their immigration problems by simply reducing poverty in developing countries.

One of the conclusions that we came to, which has had quite a lot of attention recently in the media, is that it is unfair, inefficient and incoherent for developed countries to provide aid to help developing countries make progress towards the millennium development goals on health and education while helping themselves to doctors, nurses and teachers who have been trained in and at the expense of developing countries. It is difficult to pick up a newspaper here or anywhere else without seeing reference to that growing phenomenon.

On Thursday 27 January the Kenyan Business Day contained the headline, "Rich world 'gets free ride on skills'". The report from Addis Ababa read:

"Rich countries poach doctors and nurses that poor states spend millions to train, taxing already underfunded, overstretched hospitals in Africa and elsewhere, according to a report released yesterday".

That report was by the International Organisation for Migration. The article continued:

"The organisation estimated that it would have cost rich states about $184,000 to train each of the estimated 3-million professionals educated in poor countries now working in the developed world, for a 'staggering' total savings of $552bn."

The Guardian observed 10 days ago that Sri Lanka, still recovering from the devastation of December's tsunami, has accused Britain of undermining its embattled health services by failing to prevent hospitals from luring trained doctors and nurses to work in the United Kingdom. According to its Minister of Health, the offers of big money, better facilities and prestige training establishments in Britain is too much for many Sri Lankan doctors to resist, and are causing "a grave problem" for its health system.

A report last Sunday in The Mail on Sunday observed that two thirds of our new doctors come from developing countries. Of the 27,228 new doctors registered last year, 17,718—65 per cent.—were foreign, and almost one in three came from India. That is believed to be the highest number of foreign-trained doctors registered to practise medicine in the UK in a single year. Of the 34,617 new nurses registered last year, 44 per cent. were from overseas. That means that almost half of all new nurses from overseas come from developing countries.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I have not read the report in The Mail on Sunday, as it is not my newspaper of choice on a Sunday. However, an important policy issue is clearly raised by the flow that my hon. Friend describes. Does he agree that it is incredibly important, when debating that phenomenon and deciding the appropriate policy response to it, that we avoid the development of a blame culture? As I said, I have not seen the report, but all too often there is an implicit suggestion that it is the people who are coming who are the problem—they are to be blamed and they are a source of nuisance—and a febrile atmosphere is created in which they become legitimate targets for attack. Consistent with what my hon. Friend said at the outset, that is, of course, quite wrong and should be regarded as unacceptable.

Tony Baldry: I entirely agree. As I said, the strapline of our report is, and should be, that migration and migrants should not be seen as problems to be dealt with. Migration presents both challenges and opportunities. Migrants are trying to improve their lives and must be treated accordingly. I should say, however, that I visited Lilongwe general hospital in Malawi about 18 months ago. It was probably one of the nearest things to hell on earth that I have ever seen in that there were almost no nurses. A cohort of nurses had recently finished their training and almost all were leaving Malawi straight away to come to the UK. That issue must be addressed.

The Select Committee concluded that the regulation and recruitment of health care professionals by the UK raised several issues that need clarifying. How effective has the NHS code of practice been? What will the Government do to enforce the code of practice, or to encourage NHS employers to adhere to it? Where does tacit recruitment end and active recruitment begin? Perhaps most importantly, how significant a loophole is the fact that the code does not apply to the private sector? Specifically, how many health workers from developing countries are employed in the private and public sectors, and how many of those employed in the public sector were initially recruited for the private sector? In exchanges in the Chamber, Ministers have rightly said that there is an NHS code of practice, but that code does not apply to nursing agencies. What frequently happens is that nurses from overseas are recruited by agencies and then go to work in the NHS.

Another of the Committee's conclusions is that, if the NHS is to depend on overseas workers, the Government should consider designing schemes to train nurses in developing countries for temporary employment for a specified number of years in the NHS on the understanding that they will then return to their home countries. Such a scheme would need to be carefully designed, but the potential development benefits and the fact that that would be a more cost-effective way of training nurses, no matter where they ended up working, make it worthy of serious consideration. The costs of training nurses should not be borne by countries that do not benefit from their training, particularly if they are among the poorest countries in the world.

We went on to observe that one way in which to reduce illegal migration might be to open more transparent and efficient ways for legal migration, but although that might undercut traffickers and smugglers, it would not satisfy the latent demand for migration, which needs to be managed. Illegal migration needs to be tackled.

We are concerned that the Government should do their utmost to protect migrants' rights to ensure that they are not exploited by employers, gangmasters and employment agencies. We certainly welcomed the swift progress of the Gangmasters (Licensing) Bill through Parliament; I hope that the subsequent 2004 Act will be an important step toward preventing the exploitation of workers, including migrant workers, by gangmasters.

There was a lot of discussion about the UN convention on migrants. We have invited the Government to explain why they have not ratified the convention and to provide the House with evidence to support the assumption that there is a trade-off between migrants' rights and immigration control.

We observed that, in order to ensure that returning migrants have something to go back to, Governments, with the support of donors, need to

"be serious about welcoming migrants back; make progress with improving governance and tackling corruption; ensure that pay structures and progression within the civil service do not unfairly penalise migrants who have worked elsewhere and may have acquired useful skills; and, help returning migrants to find suitable jobs, or to set up their own businesses."

We had an interesting evidence session in Southwark town hall with the Sierra Leonean diaspora in London, many of whom escaped or came to the UK in the years of conflict in Sierra Leone. For various reasons, I am a reasonably regular visitor to Freetown. The capacity of the civil service, and others, in Freetown is limited. There were probably more qualified and skilled people attending that evening in Southwark town hall than I have met in all my visits to Freetown. We must find ways to encourage people with skills to try to ensure that the countries of their birth can benefit from some of those skills, even if they do not go back to them permanently. That is not just about us, but about good governance in the countries concerned and ensuring that people feel that they can go back to countries where they have a future to look forward to.

We were pleased to hear that the Department for International Development and the European Union support programmes such as the IOM's migration for development in Africa programme, and pilot schemes in Ghana and Sierra Leone. It is only through learning from experience that the best ways of facilitating sustainable development can be discovered.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) is not here—he usually is, but I suspect that he is busy elsewhere—as he is the expert on mode 4 of the general agreement on trade in services. DFID reported that the UK's position on GATS mode 4 is widely viewed as being among the most progressive, which may be because DFID knows all about it. We say that the Government should make the UK's policy stance on GATS mode 4 clearer, and explain what the UK is doing to promote an agenda that will be of mutual benefit to the UK and developing countries. It will be interesting to hear from the Minister whether GATS mode 4 is ever used to enable people to use their skills elsewhere.

We spent some time considering remittances. As I said in my opening comments, it became clear to us that the value of remittances from migrants often substantially outstrips the value of development aid. As part of the inquiry, we spent some time in Somaliland. I am sure that the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) will talk about Somaliland, as he is probably the hon. Member with the most experience on that area, which has survived, grown and prospered almost entirely on the benefit of remittances. However, the transaction costs of those remittances can often be extremely high. We recognise

[Tony Baldry]

"the difficulty of gathering reliable data on unofficial remittances, and applaud the Government for its efforts to gather information about remittance outflows from the UK. The Government should encourage other European governments to do the same. In the absence of such information, evidence-based policy on remittances and on migration will remain an aspiration."

Migrants and their families have long been aware of the value of remittances. Greater awareness on the part of Governments and development agencies is welcome, but if the potential of remittances is to be maximised, more needs to be done to understand them and their use, to increase their flow and to make them work better for poverty reduction. The UK can encourage remittances by providing guarantees to back the issue of bonds by developing country Governments and by using tax incentives, such as treating person-to-person remittances as charitable and, therefore, as tax-deductible donations.

One problem for those who wish to send remittances back to developing countries is that the tightening of the rules on money laundering since 9/11 has made life a lot more difficult. This afternoon, we could go to addresses in Southall to deposit £5,000, and by tomorrow it would available for use in Hargeysa. However, that is becoming increasingly difficult because of the money laundering regulations, so it is much harder for people to send remittances home.

The UK Government and other Governments need to be concerned about that. We concluded:

"If transactions costs are to be reduced, then the market for remittance services needs to work better so that service providers compete harder, to offer better and cheaper services, to more informed customers.

The UK Government, NGOs and the private sector can all play their part in driving down the costs of remittances. Competition will help, but the Government needs to encourage this process by raising awareness about remittances, disseminating good practice and ensuring that the market is transparent and well-regulated."

We also spent some time reflecting on the role of the diaspora. We concluded:

"Diasporas' views are valuable and may help to deliver peace in their home countries, but it would be a mistake to assume that communities in exile are better able than people back home to represent their nations' interests."

However, we drew the attention of the House and the Government to a number of ways in which the Government and DFID might work further and better with the diaspora. We hope that the Government have taken note of those observations, because we all thought that diaspora groups, which have been largely overlooked in the development process, could, for example, be more systematically consulted on draft country assistance plans. The Treasury could also explore with the diaspora the possibility of developing schemes to enable migrants who wished to do so to channel remittances so that they have the maximum impact on tackling poverty.

Although we applauded DFID for the leading role that it has taken in moving migration up the international development agenda, we felt that the Government should consider further what might be done at a multilateral level to manage migration better, and particularly to make it work better in terms of poverty reduction. It is interesting that the main organisation that deals with migration—the IOM—is not a UN agency. As with so many aspects of migration, it seems to be slightly policy off-beat and needs to be brought far more into the mainstream.

We felt that

"The Presidency of the European Union in 2005 will provide the UK with an opportunity to promote a positive agenda on migration which takes full account of its development potential. We trust that the Government is preparing now to take this opportunity."

The Commission for Africa is meeting today for the last time before the report on its work is published in the middle of March. We hope that the Government will consider how migration might contribute to development policies, as well as many other areas.

I hope that hon. Members will take the opportunity to read our report, because it reaches a number of counter-intuitive conclusions that I hope are worth considering. We have given thought to the brain drain, remittances, the diaspora and the benefits of migration, which might not have been the focus of sufficient attention in previous work. We hope that our report is not the end but the start of thematic work, which needs to be done by the Government and other agencies, so that it does not take 10 years for migration policy to become an integral part of development policy overall, as happened with trade policy.

3 pm

Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the Chairman of the Committee. I am sure that he and other members of the Committee would agree that the report is one of the finest and most useful that we have produced, so it is good that we can debate it. I should point out that more of us would have attended this debate, but half of the Committee is on its way back from Iraq, so only the half that went to Sudan is here. You can see, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that we do not go to holiday resorts—we go where things are difficult.

The issue is important, but it tends to be dealt with only in sensationalist headlines, without any analysis. The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) referred to some of our counter-intuitive findings, and it was interesting how often we investigated things and found what we did not expect. The report starts with myths about migration, which are valuable to consider. Often, the witnesses admitted that there was a dearth of quality information and expressed gratitude that the issues were being explored.

The hon. Gentleman referred to remittances, which are often far greater than the development assistance going to the countries from which people have come, but the issue has been neglected. Similarly, DFID itself admitted that inadequate attention had been paid to working with the diasporas, another matter raised by the hon. Gentleman. The diasporas are substantial in Britain, particularly in London, but we have not addressed the problem of how to use those resources to assist the countries from which the diasporas have come.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the report makes 61 recommendations. I want to focus on just four areas: the drain of human resources from developing countries, which is an urgent problem that only the developed world can address; the problem of providing services in rural areas because of internal migration; the neglect of African agriculture, as there would be less internal and external migration if agriculture worked better in developing countries; and, finally, Somaliland. The hon. Gentleman flagged that up, and he would be astonished if I did not mention it, so I will not disappoint him.

Perhaps the most important issue in migration and development is the fact that some countries, in some areas of work, lose a disturbing number of their most qualified people to the developed world—what is commonly called the brain drain. The report puts it very powerfully:

"It is unfair, inefficient and incoherent for developed countries to provide aid to help developing countries to make progress towards the Millennium Development Goals on health and education, whilst helping themselves to the nurses, doctors and teachers who have been trained in, and at the expense of, developing countries."

That basically says, "Hypocrite—you say you're helping us." We need to consider the balance: whether we do more to help on health and education than we do to hinder through our employment policies. The report refers to the 60 to 70 per cent. of Ghana's health professionals who emigrate. The AfricaRecruit organisation, based here, calls it

"Africa's foreign assistance to the developed world".

The situation is even worse if we take into account the impact of HIV/AIDS. In my work with the all-party group on population, development and reproductive health on the relationship between HIV/AIDS and reproductive health services—which, I might point out, is launched next week under the title "The Missing Link"—UNAIDS reported that in some countries the size of the health force must triple or quadruple if universal coverage of anti-retroviral treatment is to be achieved. That is just one appalling disease, and if we are to treat it properly with the full coverage that everyone says there should be, we would need three to four times the existing health force.

In most countries affected by HIV/AIDS, vacancy rates for doctors, nurses and other health staff are extremely high. One example is Malawi—the hon. Gentleman referred to a visit to a hospital in Lilongwe—which has filled only half of its public sector nursing posts. Another staggering figure comes from Zambia, where out of more than 600 doctors trained since independence only 50 remain in the country.

That is truly the economics of Passchendaele. When we started on the study, I thought the only answer would be to stop our health and education services from robbing the developing world of its tiny minority of higher education graduates. However, while there is a place for a code of conduct in this matter, I doubt that it is having much impact. For a start, is it right to stop people seeking to extend their skills abroad? Secondly, even if we banned the practice, who else would? It is difficult to see the United States restricting recruitment in such a way, and there is a huge market all over the world for such skills. Even in this country, we have imposed a code on the NHS in England but not in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales nor on the private sector.

Another point is that our own and Europe's demand for nurses is so huge that I cannot see any Government taking the political action necessary to impose understaffing on our hospitals, given the political importance of the perception of health services and the ever-growing need for nurses in an ageing population. Just this week, a Save the Children report quotes evidence estimating that the UK will need 25,000 more doctors and 254,000 more nurses in the future than it did in 1997. That situation could be mirrored across Europe.

It is also difficult to see how we in Britain will train enough nurses of our own given the dramatically wider opportunities for women and the unwillingness of men to go into nursing in great numbers. At one time, nursing was one of the few higher education occupations that was genuinely open to women. Codes of conduct may have their place, but if we are to solve the problem, we will have to do something much more radical—the code of conduct is simply not working. In the same briefing paper on Africa's aid to the NHS, Save the Children says that between 1999 and 2004, the total number of doctors registered in the UK and trained in Ghana doubled from 143 to 293.

Not all of the situation is negative, as the remittances sent back to the homelands by educated employees can be a considerable benefit as overseas investment. The Philippines probably led the way in training more nurses than it needed. I remember listening to a Syrian Minister who said that Syria would train more educated people than if needed because they would go abroad and send money back. That pattern will continue; it is an effective way of gaining foreign investment. Similarly, some may return to their homelands after gaining valuable experience in higher education. However, I think that we have to find a more radical answer.

If we are to employ those who are have been trained in developing countries, we should pay for them. It is morally unacceptable for us to cream them off as we have been doing. At present, we are stimulating the failure to meet the MDGs by plundering African countries of their human resources. I regret to say that the international community is not yet showing the boldness necessary to tackle the issue. It is not a matter for one nation alone. We need to put money directly into training to put right the deficit that we are causing.

We need much more boldness vis-à-vis migration and personal social services than we see now in connection with internal migration; such migration makes it difficult for rural areas throughout Africa to obtain even basic services. The western pattern of youngsters leaving secondary school and going to college for three years to gain professional qualifications will not equip the rural areas of developing countries with basic services. We have to face the fact that those who go to the big cities do not return in the required numbers. In Africa, they go away to work in the big cities or they emigrate—or, unfortunately, they contract HIV/AIDS. If we are to fight HIV/AIDS, if we are to provide primary education, and if we are to equip rural areas with modern skills, we have to find ways of training nurses, teachers and others with the skills that their communities need in situ—where they live and have ties.

We need ways of harnessing the new technologies to provide skills. We need to ensure that the traditional birth attendant becomes a trained birth attendant.

[Tony Worthington]

Sometimes, the person who educates against HIV/AIDS is also the source of contraceptive supplies for those who wish to exercise choice. European staffing patterns will not meet the needs of Africa. Once again, I do not see the boldness of approach necessary to up-skill those areas.

I give another example of the importance of migration to development. We must ensure that migrations that would be damaging to development do not occur through the lack of appropriate action: a stitch in time saves nine.

I turn to the neglect of agriculture in northern development considerations. We say that we should respond to African needs, but it is difficult to find reference to agriculture in our development debates. However, agriculture is easily Africa's dominant industry. It is overwhelmingly from agriculture that future exports could come; and it is agriculture that will make a major contribution to the reduction in poverty and improvement in health.

The assumption by the development world, in Europe and further afield, seems to be that at the extreme Africa will go the same way as we have, with only 2 per cent. of the population living off the land, and that a decline in the numbers living off agriculture will occur. It is certainly true that people migrate to the cities, but for the foreseeable future agriculture will be by far the biggest industry on which most people in Africa depend. It is from agriculture that the increase in living standards will come. We must redress the current imbalances in our development policies because of the neglect of agriculture.

I look forward to the new policy on agriculture, which I think may be coming but which has been postponed—and postponed again, perhaps until after I have left this place. I say yet again that it is very important for development.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Gentleman focuses on a truly critical issue. Surely, the real disaster of the poorest people in the least developed countries, who are dependent on agriculture, is twofold. First, they are very poor and their agriculture is being diminished by western trade policies. Secondly, consistent with what my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) said in presenting the report, either because they are simply too poor or because they lack access to information about alternatives that might be available to them, they do not migrate. Therefore, they have to stew in their own juice through no fault of their own.

Tony Worthington: I concur with that. I am delighted to see the unfairnesses of our trade policies emphasised. However, anybody who thinks that if we get rid of the common agricultural policy and make our trade policies completely fair then African agriculture will boom is living in cloud cuckoo land. Products of the right quality still have to be grown for export in the necessary quantities, and there is a huge self-sufficiency deficit to be made up. The movement to towns in Africa reflects not the magnetism of the towns but an avoidable failure in agriculture. Many towns do not have a burgeoning industry or employment opportunities of a quality that would justify movement off the land. A lot of migration occurs because the land is not being used properly. I hope that the Commission for Africa report will address that issue, although the consultation paper was not encouraging in that respect.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): This is a genuine question; I elicit the hon. Gentleman's expertise. Can he explain why, if policy on agriculture becomes fair and the west stops dumping and ends the disgraceful regime of subsidised exports and the rest, we will not see the beginning of the renaissance of African agriculture? I am thinking of the micro-examples of exports from some farms in Kenya and elsewhere. Why would that not start to be repeated across the continent, as people invested to take advantage of the labour rates in Africa, which are relatively cheap compared with those of the developed world?

Tony Worthington: It will help. It would be foolish to say that it would not. However, there is more to it. I am, coincidentally, coming to a couple of relevant examples. It is often said that Africa never had the agricultural revolution, which was a huge stimulus to development in Asia. However, for internal reasons—not, in my view, for trading reasons—Africa becomes less self-sufficient and more dependent on others for its food security every year.

One or two of the instances that I am about to give are now being tackled, but that leads people to ask why they were not tackled before. Take the agricultural problem of tsetse fly, which affects cattle. It prevents them from being used effectively for ploughing. If the cattle in an area are infected by tsetse fly, perhaps only half the land in that area can be ploughed for crops, because the ploughing has to be done by hoe or dug by hand-pulled ploughs. There is now an Africa-wide proposal for tackling tsetse fly—I believe that it is going to start in six countries—and that is very welcome. However, one has to ask: why only now? Why, after generations of investment, are we not looking at ways in which the productivity of the land in those areas might be doubled or trebled?

Let me give another example. Many parts of Africa have similar problems. The hon. Members for Banbury and for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) will remember going to Malawi. The country's agriculture is in crisis. Its soil, like that of many other areas, is degraded and depleted, which reflects the fact that much less fertiliser is now used. Interestingly, the United Nations millennium project report by Jeffrey Sachs, called "Investing in development: A Practical Plan to Achieve the Millennium Development Goals", says that a quick win could be gained through the massive replenishment of soil nutrients for smallholder farmers through the free or subsidised distribution of fertiliser and agroforestry, which would be of massive benefit. Other things are then needed to make that sustainable. When my colleagues and I visited Malawi, we found that they kept sowing maize, and the soil could not cope with yet more demands on it, but the country has no mechanism and no policy to remedy an issue that is crucial to it.

It is time that we started to mean it when we talk about African needs and giving country ownership to Africa. I draw colleagues' attention to a wonderful book produced by the New Partnership for Africa's Development on the comprehensive Africa agriculture development programme. It is not a bestseller, but everyone has their own taste. Agriculture is at the top of NEPAD's agenda, but European development agencies hardly mention it. It is important, when talking about migration, to avoid migrations that do not need to occur and to avoid sending people to towns that cannot cope. Africa, where most people are farmers, cannot feed itself, and has not been able to do so for many years. The number of people who are chronically undernourished in sub-Saharan Africa continues to rise. The NEPAD document states:

"Agriculture led development is fundamental to cutting hunger, reducing poverty, generating economic growth, reducing the burden of food imports and opening the way to an expansion of exports."

Why are we failing to listen to Africa about the importance of agriculture?

Finally, I want to talk about Somaliland, which the Committee visited and on which we commented in our report. I do so to point out the link between politics and migration, as it is often political factors that affect migration. Broadly speaking, Somaliland is the old British Somalia, which attained independence in 1960 and threw it away five days later by joining the old Italian Somalia. It rapidly regretted that decision. It was an unhappy relationship, which culminated in the dictator Siad Barre committing atrocities that we would have recognised as genocide if the television cameras had turned up, but we did not know about it. I visited the area a couple of years later, and have never seen devastation like it. Some 50,000 people were killed and 500,000 fled. I still cannot imagine an enemy taking off from the local airport, having loaded up with bombs, and bombing the local town. That is a very effective way of obliterating everything, which is what happened in Hargeisa.

The significance of that event was that the chances of Somaliland, the old British Somalia, living with the rest of Somalia were nil. Understandably, the Somalilanders declared independence, and backed up that declaration overwhelmingly in a referendum. Some 13 years later, no one has recognised them. Somaliland and the rump Somalia have gone radically different ways since then. Somaliland has gradually built up its democracy, with local government elections and presidential elections; at the end of next month there will be parliamentary elections. The guns have been taken off the street and the country has lifted itself off the floor by its own efforts with, as was said earlier, the considerable help of the diaspora; it is developing and behaving exactly as we say African states should if they are to receive development assistance.

Because, after about 13 years, no country has recognised Somaliland's independent status, it has not received long-term development assistance. In contrast, the rest of Somalia has remained utterly ungovernable. There has been an empty chair at the United Nations and power rests with a number of warlords whose dominant thought is to retain that illicit power by use of arms. There have been endless conferences, and much aid has been expended in trying to create a state. Recently, in Nairobi, an agreement was reached, from which we hope a Government will develop. However, I have not met anyone who is optimistic that that will last.

Incredibly, the only response of the international community to the efforts of Somaliland has been to tell it to join with Somalia in the boundaries that operated when the country fell apart. Having experienced attempted genocide it must join people like the man called "the butcher of Hargeisa", the governor of Hareisa, General Morgan. No one in this country who had gone through the same experience as the Somalilanders would agree to enter into talks with those who had oppressed them.

The relevance to migration of what I am outlining is considerable. The population of what was previously Somalia is not that of a large country, but Somalis make up one of the largest diasporas not only in this country but in the United States, Scandinavia and, above all, the surrounding countries such as Ethiopia and Kenya. By not supporting Somaliland's wish, properly expressed in a referendum that was approved by international observers, we stimulate emigration, by removing hope. My belief is that good outcomes will come through building on virtue, not by compounding failure.

The people of Somaliland have exercised their right to self-determination. They have created a growing and admirable democracy over a period of 13 years, and we still tell them, "Jump in with your enemies, who are united by only one thing—their dislike of you." That does not make sense.

My contention is threefold. First, the failure to recognise Somaliland has stimulated emigration to neighbouring countries, other countries around the world and this country, with all the distress of disruption to the families, and all the cost to the host countries. We are now forcibly repatriating Somalilanders to a country that we refuse to recognise and fail to help sufficiently. Secondly, the failure to build on strength in Somaliland risks undermining that strength, and gives comfort to the lawless who would undermine Somaliland. In addition, forces such as al-Qaeda are active in Somalia, and the failure to enlist Somaliland in the war on terrorism undermines that moderate, democratic Islamic state.

All that Somaliland is asking for is recognition of the same boundaries that were recognised at the time of independence in 1960. The unfairness of not recognising Somaliland is now going to be compounded because the international community has, after a 50-year war, granted southern Sudan the right to choose to go independent in six years' time, following the peace between north and south. Somaliland expressed its preference for independence 13 years ago, but we do not recognise it. How long must it wait before its right to choose is recognised?

My point is that choosing the wrong foreign policies causes migration and undermines development so that, for all its progress, Somaliland is desperately poor, and its people do not receive the same level of development assistance as other countries, although they have behaved democratically and according to the rules of the international community. Mercifully, there are signs of change. It is possible to see in the attitude of South Africa, whose Foreign Minister we met in Pretoria recently, and in the important bordering state of Ethiopia, a more realistic and supportive stance to Somaliland.

Surely, the key state is the United Kingdom; it is recognised that we have influence in the area. I appeal to the Foreign Office to moderate its action. My view is backed by the International Crisis Group which has, for years, written the most authoritative reports on Somalia and Somaliland. I quote from one on Somaliland:

[Tony Worthington]

> "Somaliland's recognition as an independent state would be the most expedient though diplomatically contentious solution. Since Somaliland was once however briefly an independent state with international recognised boundaries, its recognition would not constitute a violation of the AU charter's insistence on the respect for boundaries".

That would also staunch the flow of migrants, who would see hope in Somaliland, by recognising the responsible way in which the Somalilanders had worked for the last 13 years. I have been trying to illustrate how heavily migration is influenced by political action, and this is an area in which I believe that we should act.

3.31 pm

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I was not a member of the International Development Committee when the inquiry into migration and development was undertaken. As a consequence, I did not hear or take part in the gathering of the evidence. That said, I did read the report when I was shadow Secretary of State for International Development. I have re-read it, and it strikes me as excellent—one of the best that the Committee has produced. I say, probably cynically, but also realistically, that it was entirely to be expected that a report of this importance, based on serious work undertaken in a cross-party spirit, should be of such obviously little interest to the vast majority of the media. That is a fact of life; it is certainly the way of the modern media. However, the subject that we are considering is of the highest importance and the parameters of the inquiry and the tone of the debate are phenomena from which the whole British political process could learn. Debate about migration is usually of quite a low calibre. However, I can say, because I was not on the Committee at the time of the gathering of the evidence or the publication of the report, that the calibre of this report and of the debate on it is of a higher order.

It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington), who made a typically thoughtful and thought-provoking speech. He followed my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), who introduced the report. My starting point is this: immigration should not be seen as a source of embarrassment, a reason for apology or a fact to hide. Immigration, subject to proper but not punitive control, is invaluable to our country. Migration, where it is accompanied by effective use of remittances, decent aid programmes and positive trade policies, can also be part of a package that is very good news for developing countries.

That is worth emphasising at the outset, because the whole tone of the debate about migration is always both negative and defensive. It takes place in an atmosphere generated by media who are preoccupied with creating headlines rather than reporting stories. The worst of our media want to create the impression that immigration is a thoroughly bad thing, that it is either to be blamed on the country that is the source of the immigration, or on the immigrants themselves who are rational economic actors, very properly trying to improve their lot, or that it is the fault of duplicitous, insincere, cowardly, fraudulent or conspiratorial domestic politicians who are not worth a jot. That strikes me as absolutely wrong.

My first observation based on the report relates to recommendation No. 6 in paragraph 17, in which the International Organisation for Migration suggests that a short annual report on migration to the UK from developing countries should be put together and published. That report would provide the factual wherewithal to conduct a decent debate about migration and development in future; such a factual basis has been substantially lacking in the past. Such a report would tell us, in relation to our country, who is coming, what those who come are doing, whether they are remitting and, if so, to what extent, whether they are returning to their countries of origin, on what basis and after what period, and what our Government are doing, in isolation and in co-operation with others, to make migration more development friendly. In short, we need to establish how we are acting, individually and collectively, to ensure that where possible migration becomes an opportunity for all concerned and not a threat to the migrants, the recipient countries or the countries from which the migrants have come.

I should like to make a second suggestion. The recommendation is good, and I am glad that the Committee made it. However, could we not, perhaps under the auspices or with the encouragement of the Select Committee, secure undertakings from the different political parties in the UK that after the election we will make a genuine attempt to forge a cross-party approach to migration and the development that can flow from it?

When we approach a general election, the quality as well as the intensity of political debate should improve. In practice, more often than not, the opposite is the case. The intensity of debate is heightened, but its quality is not. I do not blame any one political party or any individual or any team of individuals; the pressures are built into the system. I find it rather unsavoury that for some years after an election relatively modest attention is paid to the whole gamut of issues entailed in migration and development but that, as a general election approaches, all of a sudden the debate on those issues is ratcheted up, and there is great focus on the issues. There is great pressure for one party to outdo the other, the media are on our backs, and it becomes a test of who can sound—or be—the toughest. That is not a criticism of any individual or party, it is a fact of the debate on migration to this country. That has been the case for the best part of half a century, and it is regrettable.

After the election, which I hope that my party will win, and the Under-Secretary hopes that his party will win, why can we not have a cross-party inquiry into the sources, process, costs, benefits of and future policy towards migration? Some may say that that sounds far too consensual; after all, we come from separate political parties and our job is to holler away, make our case and rubbish that of the other side. However, I wonder whether that is true.

Mr. Deputy Speaker, you have been in this House for the best part of three and a half decades; I have been here for only just coming up to eight years. However, my hunch is that if we looked back three and a half decades, we would find that the esteem in which politicians were held was then greater and deference towards them higher. The public standing of politicians is at an all-time low. One reason for that is that the public feel that we have an habitual slanging match, not as a matter of duty, but because we enjoy it and we want to highlight, celebrate and exacerbate the differences between us almost, in the context of immigration, irrespective of the cost to immigrants, recipient countries and countries from which immigrants come. That is a sad state of affairs.

I do not think that the public would scorn the idea of a cross-party inquiry into migration; a lot of decent, fair-minded, intelligent people would welcome it. If opinion-formers took the lead, said that this is something that we could go forward with and endorsed the idea of a royal commission to consider migration with respected voices being heard, just think what might happen to the calibre of debate in this country about migration, development and the future of the developing world. My feeling is that over a period the culture would change.

There is no point in trying to appeal to bigots; it is a worthless exercise. The message falls on deaf ears because those who are motivated by prejudice are not interested in the facts about immigration and development policy. They have a set view and a warped mindset. They believe that we are being drenched with an outpouring that they do not want and we do not need. Whether they call it a flood or a downpour, that is how they view the situation, and they are not interested in any other view. Politicians should try to take the lead in developing a much higher quality of debate.

It may be said that what I am talking about is abstract stuff so far as the report is concerned. The honest answer is that it is, but it is relevant to the political climate. Lest I get into trouble with Mr. Deputy Speaker, the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, of which I am privileged, under his distinguished chairmanship, to be a member, I shall move to specific practicalities.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We are very grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to you for your forbearance thus far, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I do not want to push my luck.

Recommendation 10, set out in paragraph 46 of the Committee's report, states:

"The UK Government is a member of the Working Group which has developed the Commonwealth's Draft Protocol on the Recruitment of Teachers; we trust that this is a sign of its commitment" to that draft protocol. It continues:

"The UK is not a signatory to Commonwealth's Code of Practice for the International Recruitment of Health Workers."

There is a view that if the Government were a signatory, they could improve multilateral regulation. I would be interested to hear more from the Minister on that. My understanding from the Government's reply is that Ministers are saying that they could not commit to undertakings that they would not be able to control in relation to an international protocol, and, notably, that they are concerned that they would be required to act on all recruitment agencies, both in the United Kingdom and overseas. That might be a legitimate practical concern.

I am slightly less convinced by the Government's argument that the text on compensation is unacceptable and that it would be too expensive. That is only partly true. Even if one thinks that an absolutely open-ended commitment to pay training costs to enable countries to replace sets of workers that it had lost are too great, surely it would be possible for us at least to consider, as I think the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie suggested, that we might contribute at least some of the cost of training some of those staff; it could form a part of a package that we would provide.

The Government may be concerned about making a rhetorical commitment or a binding statement that might require us eventually to sign a blank cheque, but I fully understand that no Government could do that. The Conservative party certainly would not to do so. However, we should at least be prepared to entertain the idea that if a developing country suffers a permanent or short-term loss as the result of a migration of qualified staff—if a gap needs to be filled for five or 10 years—making some allowance for that in our aid package to the country concerned seems a matter of common sense.

I move on to recommendation 15 in paragraph 56. I very much endorse the Committee's saying that the Government, in their enthusiasm to control migration, must take great care not to prevent refugees from gaining asylum. To the Committee's great credit, it distinguishes between immigration and asylum. They are too often lumped together, as though the issues are the same, but they are not. Nevertheless, it is incredibly important that asylum policy should be fairer and quicker. It is also important that we acknowledge today that asylum seekers and immigrants, taken as a whole, contribute more to our economy in financial terms than they take from it. We hardly ever read that in the tabloid newspapers, but it is nevertheless true.

I feel particularly keenly about the issue because my grandparents came to this country on the onion boat. They would not otherwise have had the chance to survive; therefore, neither would my father have had the chance to survive; and I would not have materialised at all—or at least not in this country. I am perfectly prepared to accept that many right hon. and hon. Members—on my side of the House, and most definitely on the other side—would regard that as a blessing to the community. The fact is, however, that I consider myself very fortunate. In framing an asylum policy, we must take the greatest care to ensure that those who are suffering and who should properly have a claim on this country for sanctuary are given the chance of sanctuary. It would be a tragedy if people who felt that they had a moral right to come here—a moral right that would have strong support in the country—were denied that opportunity.

It is also important to bear in mind the facts on Britain's involvement with asylum seekers, which the report acknowledges in paragraph 59 and which were emphasised by my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury. Anyone reading the British newspapers could be forgiven for thinking that that the UK was in the front line when dealing with refugees. It is a widespread perception not only among uneducated and uninformed people but among many who are otherwise relatively well informed and highly educated. People think in terms only of this country and do not reflect all that much on the wider scene. The reality, as my hon. Friend helpfully pointed out, is that most of the world's refugees are hosted by under-resourced countries. The idea that most of them come here is simply wrong. We need a better managed and more equitable asylum, protection and migration process across the world. We also need, I believe, migration partnerships with major asylum-generating countries.

[Mr. Bercow]

Recommendation 21 in paragraph 65 is important. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury referred to it; I would like to develop that a little further. The recommendation stresses that we must do our utmost to protect migrant rights. That means doing so through legislation where necessary and also means enforcing that legislation as a matter of course. It means that information about rights and responsibilities should be provided under the terms of that legislation. The Government have highlighted in their response the launch of bilingual leaflets in the United Kingdom, Poland and Lithuania entitled, "Working in the United Kingdom—Know your rights and how to get help and advice." I welcome that; it is a positive step and precisely what the Government ought to be doing.

We should also support robust efforts to tackle exploitation by employers, gangmasters and employment agencies. In that context, the Committee is right to welcome the passage of the Gangmasters (Licensing) Act 2004. I am, however, conscious of a serious problem with a number of employment agencies. It has been covered to some degree in the media, but I would like to say something more about it.

News reports, which I picked up through the BBC, recently suggested that employment agencies were cheating workers on pay and that particular victims of that cheating and illegal, in some cases, behaviour were migrant workers. A report by the Trades Union Congress said that the growing trend particularly affected migrant workers. A number of agencies are allegedly charging workers inflated meal, transport, accommodation and clothing costs. Worryingly, the TUC has said that many of the victims of that phenomenon have stayed silent because they are either unaware of minimum wage law or scared of losing their jobs. In other words, people are frightened to speak out or do not know that they have the right to do so, or both.

Members of Parliament, critically, have a duty to be voices for the voiceless. Where people are not getting what they are due, it is our responsibility to highlight it. It is not good enough simply to say that the law is there and it is up to people to be aware of it, and that if they are, they can seek redress through the courts and so on. We are talking about people who are, in many cases, struggling to exist. The idea of living in any sense in which we understand it is not on their immediate agenda. They are frequently living at the margins of society, and it seems to me that in the name of the rule of law we have a duty to highlight abuses and to do something about them.

There is an argument about what exactly needs to be done where migrants are victims. The TUC suggests that new regulation is needed. Unsurprisingly, perhaps, the Recruitment and Employment Confederation is saying that introducing more red tape would simply penalise and restrict British business and should therefore be avoided. Ideally, it should, although that is not an absolute so far as I am concerned. What matters is tackling the abuse. If the existing law can be more robustly implemented and people can be made aware of their rights under it, that should be the priority. However, we need to keep an eye on the situation, and we should not rule out the possibility of taking other action if necessary.

I have two further points, and then I will rest my case. First, in relation to recommendation 58 of the report, the Committee makes the point that > "It is sensible to support governments which are moving in the right direction, improving governance and fighting poverty," but says:

> "it would be a mistake to make aid conditional on measures which aim to limit out-migration. Withdrawing aid to countries which fail to limit out-migration would simply plunge them further into poverty; threatening such a withdrawal would force developing countries to spend scarce resources on border controls rather than poverty reduction, would undermine any notion of partnership, and would simply succeed in pushing more migrants into the arms of smugglers and traffickers. Development assistance or the threat of its withdrawal must never be used as a tool for migration management. We trust that this remains the Government's position."

I strongly endorse that position, which should be the stance of all mainstream political parties. We have to develop a critical mass in the debate that is so strong that it comes to be unacceptable for any mainstream news organisation to argue against such a position.

I think that the presidency of the European Union in 2005 will, as the Committee has said, provide the United Kingdom with an opportunity to promote a positive agenda on migration that takes full account of its development potential. In that context, I confess that I am not as familiar as I should be, and hope that I will become, with the proposed Commission communication on migration and development, which follows on from Council conclusions adopted in May 2003. I would also be interested to hear rather more from the Minister about the preparations for the launch of a pilot scheme to develop regional protection programmes that are aimed at strengthening protection for refugees in their region of origin. Those will be high priorities for the UK's presidency, and I am sure that I can safely say that, irrespective of which Government are running the show in this country after 5 May.

I conclude by saying that migration to this country is not taking place because life in this country is too good; it is taking place because life in the countries of origin from which migrants come is all too often too bad. We cannot accept responsibility for every deficiency, failure and poor policy in the countries from which migrants come—that would be absurd. Where good governance is involved, there is a responsibility on the part of the country concerned to want to help itself and make the lives of its citizens better. It has a duty to minimise conflict, an obligation to respect human rights and a duty to put health, education and public service programmes before weapons of war. Nevertheless, we have an input to make in pursuing policies on aid, debt relief, the promotion of good governance, building capacity and fostering successful trade by developing countries that can greatly enhance their opportunities.

I think that western trade policies are morally wrong, economically counter-productive and ultimately politically dangerous. They are not dangerous in the sense that they are likely to cause weapons of mass destruction to be unleashed on this country, although it is not impossible. They are dangerous more in the insidious and gradual sense that they eventually conduce to a terrible sense of resentment on the part of countries that feel that they are being denied their legitimate opportunity to compete, grow and improve their own living standards. If, in other words, our wealth is either built or extended on the back of discrimination that exacerbates the poverty of the poor. That is unacceptable, and eventually there will be a political price for the developed, rich world to pay. I do not want that to happen. I want there to be a sound, robust and fair migration and development policy. I want it to be the norm for every mainstream political party to regard it as a priority to develop such a policy. Yes, we must have tough controls on immigration to our country. Yes, we must protect our borders. But we must also remember that a key feature of the best tradition of British policy is not only firmness, but fairness. Too often, we remember the pleas for firmness. We forget the pleas for fairness. I hope that, in its way, the report and our debate will contribute to an altogether better atmosphere for effective policy making to ensure that migration becomes a good tool for international development.

4.1 pm

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): I begin by complimenting the three hon. Members who have spoken on their excellent contributions. The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), the Chairman of the Select Committee, made tireless efforts throughout the gathering of evidence and the production of what is an excellent report. The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) mentioned the work that he continues to do in Somaliland. We would be forgiven for forgetting that he was, in fact, kidnapped on one visit to Somaliland. As ever, the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) made an important point when he said that the standard of debate that we have heard today will not be replayed in the press and the media throughout the country. Members of the Select Committee and other hon. Members must ensure that the press have access to this excellent report, so that they cannot say that they do not know the facts.

I want to go further than the hon. Member for Buckingham. He suggested that the parties get together after the election to work on a joint approach to the subject. It is too late. We should not get down into the gutter before the election. The public will have more respect for a party that sticks, after the election, to what it said before the election. If a spokesman of a party joins in a debate of the sort that has been criticised today—I hope that my party does not join in such a debate—it is incumbent on us all to draw attention to the report. We should be raising our game before the election, so that work can continue after the election.

Mr. Bercow: I am rightly rebuked for the modesty of my ambition. I was trying to look ahead to the weeks, months and years that will follow. However, in all seriousness, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right: from this day forward, the debate should be characterised by an observation of facts and an avoidance of prejudice.

John Barrett: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comment.

As we know, migration has always played an important role in the development of many countries and many people. We are examining the Select Committee report and the Government's response to it, but it is worth taking a minute to consider the role that migration has played in development and poverty reduction. In recent and more distant history, we have witnessed great population shifts for various reasons. Recently, that has happened because of famine and drought in Africa. However, population shifts have been caused by opportunity. People left Ireland for the United States. People emigrated to Australia and the Commonwealth through the assisted passage scheme.

The hon. Gentleman told us about the onion boat that brought his grandparents to this country. As a young couple in the 1950s, my parents left the United Kingdom on the assisted passage scheme and emigrated to Australia. For £10, they left for new opportunities and a new life in Australia, where I was born. Due to various circumstances, I might not have been here today, but when I was a young child my parents decided to return to Scotland.

Such matters are interesting. The fact that Scots have travelled throughout the world, whether to take up employment in the medical profession, banking or other sectors, has had a major impact. At the same time, the population of Scotland is falling. In fact, one of the Scottish Parliament's major initiatives is to encourage people to come to Scotland. The population of Scotland is expected by 2009 to have fallen below 5 million for the first time ever. It has become clear that immigration is one of the ways in which Scotland must tackle that problem. When asked recently what the major problems facing Scotland were, the First Minister said that decreasing population was a key issue and that we had to attract people with the necessary skills to our country.

We have heard about the report being unanimous. It is interesting that, when we consider problems, things are often clear. For example, when we have considered famine, drought, HIV and so on, we have found that they are obviously bad. When we consider migration, however, we find that it is neither good nor bad; it is a challenge and opportunity, as other hon. Members have said.

Some of the most unsettling aspects of migration arise when it is forced and involves the vulnerable—often, women and children—sometimes for the worst of all reasons, such as for work in the sex industry. On the BBC news website today, there is coverage of one of the worst possible aspects of migration: pregnant mothers migrating to sell their newborn children. One wonders what has happened to the world when we read that such things are happening. The headline was "Bulgaria's disturbing baby market". Young pregnant mothers travel from Bulgaria to Greece to sell their newborn babies. However, in one of the two cases described on the BBC website, the child was born with disabilities and the prospective adoptive family did not want him.

[John Barrett]

That is one of the most despicable aspects of migration, but the article says:

"It is hard to investigate and statistics are difficult to get hold of."

I will return to that issue. It is hard to pinpoint exact statistics or to determine the precise scale of the problem, whether it is drug trafficking or illegal migration.

As the Chairman of the Select Committee said, an excellent aspect of the report was that it debunked many common myths, for example, about the tidal wave of migrants, about the poorest flooding into this country and about migration being just a brain drain. There is not enough time to go into the many aspects of the report, but now when people raise immigration and asylum seekers with me, I will send the report to them. Although it does not deal specifically with asylum in great detail, it is well worth reading.

My constituency is predominantly white European, but people have contacted me to ask what to do about the tidal wave of migrants coming into the country. They do so because of the view in the press that immigrants and asylum seekers are one and the same. In the general public's mind, the two are regarded as one body of people.

As has been said, patterns of migration have remained much the same for the past 30 years. Between 2 and 3 per cent. of the world's population have been involved, although the numbers are growing as the world's population grows. Where migrants live is detailed on page 16 of the report. The top 10 recipient countries are set out and the UK does not feature among them. We are not talking about just a north-south flow. The reasons are many and varied. Migration is voluntary and forced, and there are push and pull factors.

Migration is an option for everyone except the poorest of the poor. We could emigrate at some time in life if we wanted to, but the poorest of the poor are basically stuck at the bottom of the heap. There is a new concept, detailed on page 20, which is called the migration hump. That explains exactly how people have to get off the bottom of the economic ladder before they have the resources to move. Once people get beyond a certain point in life and become relatively affluent, there is no need to go off seeking better fortunes elsewhere.

There is little hard evidence on migration and development, however. Again, that is a good reason for the report's publication. I noticed that in their response the Government accept that there is room for improvement, so that people can get the facts and deal with the challenges ahead. I look forward to the Minister's response and hope that there are other ways to gather detailed statistics.

We have heard much about the impact on our health system and those of other countries. The hon. Member for Banbury recalled our visit to a hospital in Malawi. This month, trained midwives from the New Royal infirmary in Edinburgh are going to the same hospital to teach its midwives aspects of critical care, so that they can deal with high-risk births. The irony is that, once trained, those midwives may find that their opportunities elsewhere increase. As midwives with standard training, they may or may not stay where they are, but with expert training, they might move not to the United Kingdom or the United States, but to South Africa. There is a knock-on effect throughout the world: we are recruiting people from South Africa, and South Africa is recruiting workers from other, less developed countries.

The NHS, in evidence sessions, could not say exactly how many nurses from developing countries were working in the UK, but those figures must be able to be gathered. As I said, there are similar problems with South Africa attracting nurses from poorer countries. Although we have agreed a code of practice, there is much work to be done. The current situation is not tenable. That was brought home to me recently when I visited a nursing home in my constituency. Only one of the care assistants was from Scotland. Most came from eastern Europe.

I fear that the worst aspect of migration is trafficking, smuggling and illegal migration. I am talking about people exploiting the most vulnerable and making large profits. Their activities often involve deception and forced sexual exploitation of the most vulnerable—women and children. It is estimated that 500,000 people a year are smuggled into western Europe, and 2 million people globally. In south-east Asia, the prostitution industry and sex tourism are two of the worst aspects. I am pleased to know that the Government have taken a tough line on those from the UK who have travelled abroad to abuse others through the sex industry.

Oxfam has said that tightening restrictions in the EU could lead to more trafficking. The way forward is an open and transparent system, especially for short-term or seasonal workers, who might be happier to come to this country for a short time if they found out that they could easily go back. The pull that someone's homeland has is amazing. Hon. Members have referred to Somaliland and other pretty well devastated areas, but it is amazing how much people want to go back to their homeland, either during their working life or after they have retired. They may say that their homeland is where they would like to end their days. We must have an open system whereby there is a freer flow for legal migrants.

I agree that refugees, asylum seekers and migrants are treated as one mass. The Select Committee accepts what the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees said—those groups must be differentiated. Refugees and economic migrants have different reasons for moving. We must be able to offer a safe haven for people whose lives are genuinely threatened. Their situation is different from that of someone who decides arbitrarily to come to this country or to go to the US or another country.

We have seen recent migrant flows in Darfur in southern Sudan. We have recently visited refugee camps of more than 140,000 people and witnessed the impact that those people have had on local resources—food, markets and water. That movement of people internally in some of the most deprived nations of the world is happening as we speak. The report and the Government's response go a long way towards keeping this important item on the agenda. However, it is important that we, as parliamentarians, do not get dragged into the gutter as we approach the general election. The facts are clear for the UK. There are about three refugees per 1,000 of population; in Georgia the figure is 51 per 1,000 and in Liberia it is 87. There are 100,000 Afghan refugees in the EU, compared with 1.4 million in Iran and 2 million in Pakistan.

Many people in this country may feel that we do too much for immigrants or refugees, but the developing world is often of the view that we do not do enough or take our fair share. The figures in the report show that a lot of refugees are not in the richest countries of the world. It has been mentioned that people are open to exploitation by gangmasters, and the way that the control of gangmasters has been dealt with in recent legislation is to the credit of the Government.

I want to touch briefly on remittances. The potential is great. We have heard examples about the scale of remittances—some £93 billion-plus in formal transfers, which exceeds the flow of aid to developing countries. What we must do in this country, working with the international banking sectors, is ensure that transaction costs are reduced. A relatively large chunk of the money can disappear in fees or transaction costs. Many migrants have no bank accounts, and sometimes the places where they try to send their money have no banking system. We must do what we can to make remittances work for poverty reduction.

There is general acceptance that remittances will never lead to massive poverty reduction, but they can make a positive contribution either locally, through a house construction perhaps, or generally through the flow of capital into areas that have relatively low average incomes. Remittances have an important part to play, and I was pleased to find out that there is a team in the Department for International Development looking at financial sector reform and banking systems.

The Government's response to the report was interesting. They have accepted an awful lot of what it suggested and that there is still some distance to go. There is no doubt that a lot of good work has been done. To give credit where it is due, DFID is involved in programmes such as the training of doctors and nurses in Malawi. It has also provided a substantial sum of money. However, there is no point in training doctors and nurses over there if they just come here without putting anything back into their country of origin. We must develop systems, so that there can be a win-win situation. If our health service gains their expertise while they increase their skills and either send remittances back or return to work in their country's health sector, both the countries and the doctor or nurse can benefit. DFID is also involved in a number of livelihood programmes associated with internal migration in countries such as India.

Looking to the future, our presidency of the EU and G8 gives us an excellent opportunity to ensure that we accept the challenges and stand up to be counted. We read nonsensical stories in the press—the story of the hard-working immigrant is not one that they want to see. They want stories about immigrants and/or asylum seekers abusing the system, taking money that they are not entitled to or sneaking into the country.

The Government have done a lot of good work. I hope that whichever party is elected—I make no assumptions about that; Labour and the Conservatives hope to be elected and the Liberal Democrats are very optimistic—we ensure that, when immigration and migration is on the agenda, our standards do not fall to the level that we sometimes see. We must keep the standard of debate as high as it has been this afternoon.

4.19 pm

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): The first thing that I must do is offer the apologies of my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State for International Development, who is involved in work with the Commission for Africa, and his deputy my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier). That is why it has fallen to me as the Whip on the shadow international development team to respond to this debate for Her Majesty's Opposition.

Looking around the Chamber, I feel as if you and I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have been involved in an extremely high-priced seminar, organised almost entirely for our benefit. The Minister will have been involved in preparing the Government's response to the Committee; otherwise, this debate has been decorated and contributed to by members of the Committee, and I am grateful for the experience. I have greatly enjoyed listening to the contributions over the last couple of hours, and undertaking the necessary preparation to respond to the debate.

I congratulate the Chairman of the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), on what is undoubtedly a serious and weighty piece of work. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) that the amount of media attention attracted by Committees of the House of Commons seems to be in inverse proportion to the seriousness and weightiness of their work. Of course, my hon. Friend is correct when he says that the media are looking for areas of difference and controversy between the parties. He is also right that Select Committees function best when there is cross-party unanimity, when they seek areas of agreement and do thorough analysis in order to inform our debates in the House of Commons, as well as the wider debate in the country.

The Committee is to be congratulated on its work. The simple, basic point made in the context of this report about the benefits that flow from migration—such as poverty reduction and wider economic benefits for this country—should be constantly restated. It can be seen in the micro-analysis of the benefits that recent migrants bring. I understand that their economic contribution is above average for people in the United Kingdom. The Committee's contribution in identifying such issues and producing evidence is important. It is absolutely necessary that in this House we proceed on the matter on the basis of evidence and of information that, if challenged, can be tested and proved to be correct. I regret to say that there is a relative dearth of information. More work needs to be done to follow up that of the Select Committee, which I hope will, in due course, return to the topic. Indeed, it would be appropriate for other Committees, such as the Home Affairs Committee, to examine the issue as well.

Let me turn to the detail of the debate. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) described himself as an optimist. Some might think that to be a peculiar state of affairs for a native of Edinburgh, when one considers its weather—particularly today of all days—and given the rather quixotic decision of his parents to return there from Australia. I think that it was Robert Louis Stevenson who said that the climate of Edinburgh was so bad that the weak died young and the strong envied them their fate. However, the hon. Gentleman agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham that it is important to seek consensus on this issue, and I certainly support him in that.

[Mr. Crispin Blunt]

Let me comment briefly on the hugely enjoyable philosophical diversion that my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham indulged in early in his remarks. I have already endorsed his call to identify aspects of this serious issue on which we can take a bipartisan approach. However, although there is a great deal of agreement between the Government and the official Opposition on policy, there is a great concern about whether that policy is being administered effectively. It is proper to identify whether there are areas in which policy is failing or objectives are not being achieved due to administrative failure. While there is significant agreement between the Government and the main Opposition party on the objectives of immigration policy, there is a critique to be made on how the policy is put into practice. It is necessary, on the back of reports and analysis such as this, that the debate be conducted on the basis of evidence and fact. It should be anchored on the fact that immigration is a beneficial necessity to the United Kingdom, as it is to other countries, including those in the developing world. However, it will have to be subject to necessary controls.

As the Committee makes clear, it is not necessarily an issue about the relationship solely between the developed and the developing world; it is not in one particular direction. The most recent public cause of concern about immigration relates to English migrants into parts of France. There have been protests from French villagers about how the nature of their communities is changing with English incomers. Plainly, that has little to do with the work of this Committee, but it is one tiny example of how this is an extremely complicated and multifaceted issue.

I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham took a rather deterministic view of the attitude of part of our community. He described some people as bigots; as people who would not be prepared to change their views. Given that that came from one of the most gifted rhetoricians in the House of Commons, who has enormous talents of persuasion, that was a rather disappointing view. The way that the climate of opinion can be changed by sensible analysis, and by making the benefits of migration clear, works just as much for people who appear to have a very determined position at some stage as it does for the rest of us.

Operating on the basis of evidence is the appropriate way to go forward; everyone is open to rational argument and evidence. My hon. Friend's comments could be applied to the greatest Briton of all—if one is to believe the BBC's analysis—Winston Churchill. If one considers some of the things that he said in the early parts of the 20th century, he would drop straight into the category to which my hon. Friend referred.

Mr. Bercow: I am glad that my hon. Friend is joining me in this philosophical exploration of the issues. I put it to him that any analysis or study of history must work on the assumption that people are judged by the standards and mores of the time, into which context periodic writings and speeches by the late and great Sir Winston Churchill must be placed. What I meant in my remarks was that there was a small but persistent minority of the population, not least represented in the British National party, who are beyond persuasion.

However, my hon. Friend is right to suggest that the bulk of people, who might not always be fully informed, are open to persuasion. I referred to people who are decent, open-minded and ready to be impressed by the evidence. It is at those people that we should be aiming. We should seek not to negotiate with prejudice but to overcome it.

Mr. Blunt: In that I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. However, I would dispute that there is an irreducible minimum. Some of the most effective advocates against racism are people who were members of the BNP at one point; they are exactly the people who have been taken in by the simplicity of arguments and therefore had corresponding attitudes to immigration and migration. They will sometimes make the most effective advocates when they have been exposed to rational, decent argument and persuaded by it.

That is why one must go on making the proper, decent case for the values of immigration, the values that immigrants have brought to British society and the benefits that are enjoyed across the world by the fact that people move between societies for a variety of reasons.

I listened to the contribution of the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington). As usual, I did so with the greatest respect, given his enormous experience and knowledge in this area. His point about the drain from developing countries and the number of Zambian doctors who have been trained in Zambia and remain there is shocking. That is repeated to an extent, but it is a particular problem relating to health workers in Africa. I want to return to that. I hope that he is being unnecessarily pessimistic about the potential of African agriculture. I am sure that he is correct about the short term, but there are opportunities for it in the medium term, as we have seen in areas where it has received investment.

Tony Worthington: I apologise if I misconveyed what I was trying to say. I am not pessimistic about the potential of African agriculture; it has huge potential. I am, however, pessimistic about the lack of recognition for that potential, as displayed in the developed world's willingness to devote attention to African agriculture. There are huge internal problems with African structures, but I am not pessimistic about the potential of African agriculture.

Mr. Blunt: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that clarification. I hope that my optimism about the potential of African agriculture will, in some microscopic way, have encouraged him.

We come to this debate on the basis of our own experiences, and I want to use a personal experience to illustrate a number of the issues that the report addresses and the complications that flow from them. A few years ago, my wife and I took on a cleaning lady to do a few hours' work a week to help us at home. She was a Filipina; indeed, it turned out during a discussion with her that she was a Filipina nurse. She was extremely concerned about her immigration status and she was initially rather unwilling to discuss it when she found out that I was a Member of Parliament. The long and the short of it was that I eventually sat her down and had a chat with her about exactly what her circumstances were.

Obviously, this lady did not want to be cleaning our house; her objective was to have a proper job in the United Kingdom health service. She had fallen into the hands of people in the Philippines who offered her the opportunity to come to the United Kingdom. For a fee of $5,000, which was all she was able to get together, she obtained a new passport, which happened to be an entirely illicit document. She arrived in the United Kingdom on a student visa, which was not going to help her to find proper work, even if it had been in the correct passport. She had, therefore, been given the wrong visa in an illegal passport and had been defrauded of all her means in the Philippines in the process. Her objective in coming to the United Kingdom was to earn enough to remit money back to put her son through university.

The long and the short of the story was that I helped her find out what the rules were. In that respect, the remark by my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham about the necessity for the rules to be clear so that people can understand them is vital. It took me, as a Member of Parliament, a considerable time to discover exactly how the rules applied to a lady in such circumstances. They enabled her to go home and provided her with the air fare to do so. In order to have the funds to look after her son at university, she had to reapply to an entry clearance officer with her real passport, which had to be obtained from her home in the Philippines. She had to obtain the correct visa, so that she could come back to the United Kingdom and go on a course that enabled her Filipino nursing qualification to be acceptable in the United Kingdom. She is now back in the UK and working as a nurse, while remitting money home to put her son through university in Manila. That would appear to be a huge advantage, of course, until one discovers that he is studying politics, which may or may not be a huge benefit. However, he is getting a tertiary education that he would not have been able to afford if his mother had not been a migrant and had not been prepared to come to the United Kingdom to contribute to our health services.

The Philippines is a case in point. I understand that it produces a deliberate excess of trained nursing staff in order to help the economy to be funded by remittances. The argument about what happens in the Philippines is different from the one that applies, as I understand it, to most of Africa, but encapsulated in that one small example of migration, which greatly informed me, were the pulls, the pushes and the benefits to the Philippines. It is unarguable that huge benefit was to be gained in every conceivable direction from that one case of migration, except of course at the beginning of the process when a criminal disaster that befell the lady resulted in all her wealth being stolen from her by traffickers. That shows that it is vital for the United Kingdom to have clear rules.

I hope that within these walls and within the rather limited observation offered by the debate, we can have a sensible commentary on the various policies being offered to meet the objectives that I believe both major parties share. The opportunity for a fairer policy through a more controlled system of quotas and numbers is a better way to proceed than the rather uncontrolled effect of our current policy.

I welcome the report as an important contribution in this neglected area of migration and development. Giving evidence to the Committee, the Secretary of State said that the link between migration and development has been neglected, and that our understanding of the importance of migration to the poor in developing countries is at about the same stage as our understanding of the vital links between trade and development was 10 years ago. I agree.

The importance of migration to development is highlighted by the figures, to which hon. Members have referred, in the report. The informal transfers of remittances amount to some $300 billion year, which is significantly greater than the figure that UN identifies as necessary to meet its millennium development goals. Remittances show how hugely important migration and poverty reduction are. I agree with the Committee's recommendation that the Government should provide more information about who is coming to the UK, where they come from, what they do, to what extent they are sending funds back to their home country and how many of them return to their home country after working in the UK.

The report highlights our lack of an accurate picture of the nature of migration to the UK and its consequential impact on developing countries as well as on the UK. As the International Organisation for Migration suggests, greater knowledge of migration flows would help us to understand the impact of migration better. A more ordered and organised immigration system in the UK would greatly assist us in managing and understanding migration better than we do at present.

The report concludes:

"It is unfair, inefficient and incoherent for developed countries to provide aid to help developing countries to make progress towards the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) on health and education, whilst helping themselves to the nurses, doctors and teachers who have been trained in, and at the expense of, developing countries."

The General Medical Council register shows that the number of non-UK qualified doctors joining the register has increased enormously in the past few years, and that the trend rate of non-UK doctors joining the register is even faster than the trend rate of the growth in the NHS work force. Although non-UK qualification includes those qualified in other developing countries, it is widely accepted that a significant number of those doctors have come from developing countries. Zambia is but one of the many dozens of developing countries that are affected by this. It is the same with nursing, as we heard in the example given by my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury of the hospital in Lilongwe.

It is important that the code of practice is adhered to, and that progress is made. The Government's response to the Committee's recommendation concentrates on the push factors for health care workers. However, I am not certain whether it deals sufficiently with the pull factors attracting health workers to the UK and the steps that the Government could take to tackle those.

[Mr. Blunt]

I recognise that the code of practice was strengthened at the end of last year, and that it is now extended to temporary staff in the independent health care sector. I hope that the policy followed by the Government until 5 May, and by their successors, will lead to a reduction in developing world recruitment. There are some sensible recommendations in the report on that aspect, and about the need to invest in training in the developing world and the necessary links between the international development budget and trade.

I am not sure whether I entirely agree with recommendation 58, which makes a link between border controls and migration. I note that the Government reply states:

"The Government considers that migration issues form an integral part of the UK's overall relationship with a third country. The Government expects co-operation on the return of a country's own nationals and on the management of migratory flows. The Government is prepared to work in partnership with a country to assist with this."

I agree about that; the totality of the relationship between the United Kingdom and other countries is relevant. I do not think that the Government should take the view on principle that they will not use the levers available to them, so as to bring about necessary and beneficial improvements in the relationship with the relevant countries, and with respect to migration. It is important, with reference to codes of practice and the push and pull factors that affect migration, that the Government should use all the tools at their disposal.

I commend the Committee on a serious piece of work on a serious and important issue. The importance of migration to the ability to tackle poverty reduction is plainly enormous, on the basis of the statistics identified and published by the Committee. I look forward to further work on the matter by the Committee and other Select Committees, so that we can proceed on the basis of sound evidence and more information. That would help in bringing about what we all want; policy on which there is more agreement, certainly about policy objectives. There will always be differences—that is the stuff of politics—about how to achieve those objectives, but if we can agree about the objectives and reach more agreement about the analysis underpinning them, so much the better.

4.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I join the hon. Members for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) and for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) in praising the three previous speeches. The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) and his Committee have done the House a service in producing what is undoubtedly a comprehensive and impressive consideration of migration and development issues. The hon. Gentleman's opening speech and the speeches of my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Tony Worthington) and the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) did the House a service in exploring the issues raised and suggestions made by the Committee.

I shall try to do justice to the quality of the debate. First, I want to join other hon. Members in paying tribute to people who have migrated to the UK, for the quality and engagement that they bring, the diversity that they offer and the quality of the work that they do in our public services and the private sector. I know that the garages in north-west London could not function without the contribution of the many Tamils who have migrated to the UK. The health service could not function in north-west London without the contribution of the many Gujarati GPs or the Filipina nurses who serve in our local acute general hospital.

We need fully to comprehend the contribution made by so many of those who migrate to the UK if we are to challenge the prejudice that surrounds the immigration debate; the hon. Member for Buckingham rightly made it clear that we should continue to challenge it. He said that those in the British National party—and, I would add, the United Kingdom Independence party and Veritas—too often bring such prejudice to the debate.

The report and the debate have provided a valuable opportunity to dispel some of the myths that surround migration, to which the hon. Member for Banbury alluded. It is clear that internal and south-south movements of people are the largest forms of migration, and that is where the greater poverty impacts are likely to be. It is also true that it is those who can afford it and who have the right skills, as opposed to those with no skills, who are more likely to migrate to more developed countries to take up employment. The Committee's report also made it clear that migration offers an important livelihood strategy for poor men and women, and we should see it as a challenging but beneficial aspect of the process of globalisation.

The hon. Member for Buckingham made an interesting reference to the Committee's recommendation for an annual report on migration, as suggested to it by the International Organisation for Migration. The Government recognise that that could well be particularly useful; we will consider it as part of the forthcoming review by National Statistics of the control of immigration statistics Command Paper. We have selected a preferred contractor to undertake that work, and I hope that we can sign the contract and get on with the work in the not-too-distant future. The hon. Gentleman's idea of a cross-party dialogue on migration is interesting, too. As to whether others would want to take part in such a debate, I am afraid that I am a pessimist, but there will be a number of opportunities to test his theories in the coming six weeks.

At an international level, we are following with some interest the work of the Global Commission on International Migration. We are part of a core group of countries that the commission is consulting on the emerging themes of its work. The Department is contributing financially to supporting the commission's consultation with African representatives; that will take place in Cape Town later this month. The commission is due to present its report to the UN Secretary-General later this year, and its suggestions will feed into our high-level dialogue on international migration, which will take place at the UN General Assembly in 2006. Inevitably, such debates provide opportunities for politicians in all UN member countries to explore the issues.

A further opportunity to test the hon. Gentleman's theory will come when we consult on the policy paper on migration and development on which the Department is working. I hope that we can launch that soon and consult a variety of people, including Members of Parliament who are interested in these issues, and publish our conclusions in the not-too-distant future.

Many hon. Members have made reference to the importance of migration in tackling poverty, even though that is not explicitly included in the millennium development goals. The hon. Member for Reigate rightly alluded to the huge sums produced through remittances, which vastly outweigh international development assistance. The Committee rightly made it clear that we need to continue to look at the quality of data available and properly to consider the evidence base on the causes and consequences of migration. Across Government, we will continue to develop our capacity to produce and work with better information, and that, I hope, will feed a more informed and temperate debate than those of recent weeks.

As several hon. Members have said, migration can relieve labour market pressures, increase trade and foreign direct investment in developing countries, and allow individuals to learn new skills and to support their families at home through remittances—to help someone to go to university or, more generally, to help those without other incomes. It can also mobilise the diasporas to engage in the development of their countries of origin. Development in areas such as governance, democracy, effective civil society and gender equality can help to ensure that people's decisions to migrate out of their country are made on a more informed basis, rather than out of desperation. We need to do more; all our country's programmes seek to focus on how to continue to promote more effective government in countries that produce many people who want to migrate.

Some hon. Members have talked about skilled migration, highlighting the apparent unfairness of this country providing aid on one hand while recruiting trained personnel, particularly medical personnel and teachers. We are acutely aware of the potentially damaging effect of the so-called brain drain, where skilled migrants such as those in health and education leave developing countries in search of a better life. However, international migration is just one factor, and not necessarily the most important one, that affects public services in developing countries. Arguably, the most important factor is under-investment in health and delivery systems in such countries, coupled with the undoubtedly devastating effects of the HIV/AIDS epidemic.

The UK was the first country to produce guidance on the international recruitment of health workers, and it remains one of the few countries to have produced such guidance. Codes of practice, particularly that of the Department of Health, prevent the targeting of developing countries for such recruitment. We have spent £560 million in the past five years to support the development of health services in Africa, including the training of medical personnel.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie rightly raised the issue of capacity in developing countries. That is the biggest single issue affecting countries' responses, particularly to the AIDS epidemic, where once it was the price of anti-retroviral drugs. There have been huge reductions in the price of drugs, and the main issue is now how to develop capacity in health systems and across Governments generally to get those drugs to where they need to go. If the issue of capacity is to be tackled in countries such as those in sub-Saharan Africa—where the crisis is most acute—factors such as low pay and poor working conditions in developing countries must be dealt with, and it must be recognised that there are often security concerns in regions in which there is conflict or economic instability. Understandably, perhaps, that backdrop against the prospect of better pay and a whole series of career and training opportunities in developed countries motivates people to leave to look for other opportunities.

Some hon. Members mentioned Malawi. I accept that, in a sense, Malawi is at the epicentre of the crisis of capacity. It loses more health workers because of HIV/AIDS than from migration, and more trained nurses because of HIV than it can replace. There is an innovative programme in Malawi that, although not a pilot, is a first of its kind. We have contributed £100 million to that programme, which aims to double the number of nurses and triple the number of doctors in Malawi over the next six years, precisely to deal with capacity. That will, on occasions, involve topping up the salary of many of those who will work in the health sector, and I hope that it will begin to deal with the issue of health service capacity, to which hon. Members rightly alluded.

We also need to recognise that there is, in a number of developing countries, a reservoir of people who have been trained as nurses and who are not working as nurses at the moment. South Africa, for example, has an estimated 7,000 health professionals overseas, but there are also 35,000 inactive or unemployed nurses in the country, too, despite a huge vacancy rate, which again suggests that there is more that countries can do, with the support of the international community, to engage those who have been trained in their country.

A number of hon. Members, particularly the hon. Member for Banbury, asked whether the code of practice was strong enough. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Health launched a toughened-up code on international recruitment. That revised code will ensure, for example, that all independent-sector companies providing NHS care will sign up to the code through stipulations in their NHS contract. The loophole that in the past allowed trusts to recruit temporary and locum staff from developing countries has been closed, and agencies that supply domestic staff to the NHS will also be covered for the first time, which extends the code to some 200 extra recruitment agencies.

I should put it on the record that the NHS does not actively recruit from any country that does not wish to be recruited from. We have Government-to-Government agreements with India, Spain and the Philippines, which state that they are content for the UK to recruit health care professionals from their countries. I accept that Spain is not a developing country, but the Philippines and India most definitely are.

[Mr. Gareth Thomas]

A series of other recommendations were made in the report, one of which—the need to ensure that we are considering the special needs of refugees—has not featured particularly strongly in this debate. I am sure that a number of hon. Members have seen the proposals that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has made to strengthen the international humanitarian system, not least of which is a new £1 billion fund for humanitarian assistance and strengthened powers for UN humanitarian assistance co-ordinators.

Many hon. Members focused on remittances, on which we are working with others—not least the World Bank and the inter-agency remittances task force—to increase the information that we have about their nature. We recently commissioned the opinion poll company NOP to conduct the first of a potential series of household surveys on remittances in the UK and receiving countries. The first, which we hope will start around the end of March, will focus on the Bangladeshi community and will produce data on flows, volumes, channels and preferences of remittances to partner countries.

As one or two hon. Members may be aware, we also initiated a UK remittances products survey to help those who have migrated to the UK to understand better the level and types of remittances products that they can use. The publication of that report is due, and I hope that it will happen towards the end of March. However, very shortly I expect the initial basic information contained in it to be available at www.sendmoneyhome.org, should hon. Members wish to check the web. We have also commissioned two reports on the impact of remittances on development and are developing partnerships with Bangladesh and Nigeria to explore further practical ways to improve remittance flows to those countries.

One interesting part of the Committee's work was the session, to which the hon. Member for Banbury alluded, that it held in Southwark town hall with the Sierra Leonean community. I accept that we need to do more as a Department in particular and as a Government in general to engage the diaspora, not only on remittances but more broadly on our country assistance plans. We have begun to do that, consulting the Bangladeshi community about the aid programme in Bangladesh, for example. We have also agreed a strategic grant agreement with Connections for Development, a network of black and ethnic minority organisations that aims to mobilise civil society for action on development. We can engage it to talk to the diaspora.

The hon. Member for Buckingham will be interested to know that we will seek to use our presidency of the European Union to continue to promote a positive agenda on migration and development. He alluded to the Commission's preparing a new communication on migration and development, which follows the Council conclusions last May. I expect it to present an action plan to launch a pilot scheme designed to increase protection for refugees in their region of origin. I expect it similarly to produce an action plan to combat trafficking, which is another priority for our presidency. We hope to secure progress on those issues.

Mr. Bercow: Interventions are always difficult, and none of us is psychic: it may be that the Minister was about to address the issue that I intend to raise, but it is equally perfectly possible that he was not.

In the light of the TUC report on the levy of charges on workers, including notably on migrant workers, and on the payment of those workers below the minimum wage, does the Minister know of any contact between his Department and the Department of Trade and Industry about investigating those allegations and deciding what, if any, Government action is needed to combat the problem?

Mr. Thomas: As the hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to know, there is regular contact with the DTI, but I will check for him and write to him on his specific question.

The hon. Gentleman's intervention allows me to touch on what else we can do to support migrant rights. As our response to the report highlighted, a series of language and citizenship courses is already available to support migrants, and the Home Office has published a refugee integration strategy to explore some of the issues involved in supporting the rights of migrants. He alluded to our seeking to work with the new member states to explain the various rights available. The Gangmasters (Licensing) Act 2004 is an important piece of legislation in helping us to prevent the exploitation of those who migrate to the UK.

Before the hon. Gentleman asked his helpful and interesting question, I was going to touch further on points that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West made about trafficking. We need to continue to bear down on those who traffic people into the UK. We have introduced legislation to try comprehensively to criminalise trafficking. A new offence of trafficking for exploitation, which includes trafficking for forced labour and removal of organs for example, was included in the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004. That carries a heavy 14-year maximum penalty.

Hon. Members may be interested to know that between April 2003 and April 2004 there were some 38 successful convictions for organised immigration crime, including for those involved in human trafficking, people smuggling and related activities. However, if we are going to be truly effective on human trafficking, we need to get right our prevention measures at source. For that reason, we have given some £70,000 to Anti-Slavery International for raising awareness of the abuses suffered by victims of trafficking and for further remedial action in west Africa.

Lastly, I do not accept the points made by the hon. Member for Reigate about the Government's immigration strategy. We have a balanced immigration policy. It is important that we meet the challenge of achieving and retaining public confidence in the system—on that I agree with the hon. Gentleman—by admitting only those whom we genuinely need and can absorb, by taking only our fair share of refugees and by preventing those who do not meet our criteria from getting or remaining here. In that context, the recent strategy published by my hon. Friends at the Home Office is the way forward. Suggestions that people should be sent to islands or that arbitrary quotas should be imposed—suggestions that do not state who would and would not stay—have not been terribly helpful contributions to the debate.

Today's debate has been useful and important. Again, I commend the work of the Committee in going as thoroughly as it did through the issues. I also commend hon. Members on both sides who have contributed, which, we can all agree, has been useful and informative.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned at six minutes past Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 1 March 2005

[MR. JOHN MCWILLIAM in the Chair]

Attacks in the Workplace

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watson.]

9.30 am

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): I secured this debate in the full knowledge that Government alone cannot deal with the problem of violent attacks or assaults in the workplace. All sections of society have a vital role in ensuring that people who leave home to go to work have the fundamental right to return home safe. They should be safe in the knowledge that every effort has been made to protect them from violent attack and assault, and—this is more important—that when they are attacked, those responsible are brought to justice and the courts will deal effectively with culprits. In my view, many of our judiciary, including magistrates, are too far removed from real life and do not fully understand the long-term anxieties and pressures that many public and private sector workers face in their everyday lives at work. Such attacks impact also on the number of working days lost, which all of us have to pay for as taxpayers.

The attacks are consistent across many disciplines and industries, including among teachers, police, firefighters, health service workers, shop workers, bus drivers, and bar staff. Indeed, it is a problem for almost everyone whose job interfaces with the general public. I include our own profession, and there have been serious attacks on politicians of all parties at every level by angry, and at times frustrated, constituents. That frustration is often fuelled and exploited by sections of our press, who see politicians as fair game for abuse—verbal or otherwise. The same elements in the popular press portray migrant workers as the enemy within, and they experience racial and physical abuse as a result. Although things can be difficult for white public sector or private sector workers, we can only imagine how much more difficult life is for migrant workers who are physically or racially abused.

Why should teachers have to tolerate disruptive and obnoxious children when their parents refuse to face up to their responsibilities or seek to blame everyone else for their misbehaving children? Why should firefighters endanger their lives answering emergency calls only to be stoned by youngsters when they arrive at the location, especially when many calls are false alarms? Why should our police forces be stretched and their valuable time wasted filling in endless forms, only for them to find the accused back on the street within hours of being charged? Why should shop workers face the everyday threat, "We will be waiting for you when you finish!" simply because they refuse to serve someone or catch them shoplifting?

Why should bus drivers and other public transport workers be attacked and spat on simply for doing their jobs? Why should health workers, who are committed to saving lives, be put at risk by yobs who are drunk or under the influence of drugs? Every day, we hear of health service workers being attacked by irresponsible people who think nurses, porters, ambulance drivers and paramedics are all fair game. Perhaps we should seriously consider denying them treatment from those whom they seek to abuse.

The list of occupations is endless, but the common denominator is that all those people want to serve the public but need protection from the minority who think that they are fair game for attack. Let me put the problem into context: it is a small minority of idiots who choose to ignore the good work done by our public and private sector workers and who sometimes behave irresponsibly.

As one would expect, the trade union movement is doing its bit to address the problem and to highlight the seriousness of the issue to the general public, and none is doing more than the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, whose "freedom from fear" campaign was highly successful in raising public awareness of the huge scale of the problem. Its research showed that incidents of assault on or abuse of shop workers occur every minute of every day.

The campaign also sought to promote safer shopping partnerships and bring together the major retailers, the police, and national and local politicians. The survey showed that 47 per cent. of staff reported physical attacks or assaults over a 12-month period, that threats are made every week in one in four stores, that verbal abuse is a daily event in more than one third of stores, that time off after an incident is commonplace for traumatised staff, that threats of violence were reported in 72 per cent. of stores, and that more than 85 per cent. of staff expressed concern about verbal or physical attacks or assaults.

USDAW's conclusions from the survey were clear. More links must be set up between retailers and local authority crime and disorder reduction partnerships to deal with persistent offenders, and the police need to work more closely with stores in many areas. On proof of age, a robust scheme of age-identity cards must be adopted. Some youngsters try to abuse, bully or threaten retail staff into making a sale. Many of us have seen youngsters outside licensed premises trying to get alcohol, particularly at weekends. Sometimes they are helped by irresponsible adults who get it for them. We should consider charging and dealing effectively with those people. A robust identity scheme would take the guessing out of age-restricted sales and would significantly contribute to reducing abuse and violent incidents against shop workers.

The Government's alcohol strategy is much needed to deal with drunkenness. Survey results show that shop workers are threatened and attacked for upholding the law and refusing to sell alcohol to drunks. Their position should be considered by licensing boards when they decide on licensing hours.

Another major concern is public transport and employees who are on the front line. Again, the major trade union in that industry, the Transport and General Workers Union, is working hard to solve some of the problems that its members encounter daily. Workers the length and breadth of the country are subjected to horrendous attacks that range from being spat on, having missiles thrown through their windows and being attacked violently with knives. The TGWU has put forward sensible and practical recommendations to deal with such problems. It recommends, as a right, that there should be no loss of earnings for assaulted public transport workers. There should be an obligation on employers to offer professional counselling facilities; a firm legal requirement on operators to carry out risk assessments on violence and to implement appropriate agreed measures; requirements for bus operators to install and keep in good order radio or alarm systems; special compensation for front-line public service staff to include bus drivers, benefit staff, railway workers, firefighters and health workers with fast-track financial settlements; a clear directive from Government accompanied by more resources to enable a higher-priority police response to public transport assaults; mandatory prison sentences or tougher penalties for those convicted of attacking workers; legal sanctions to ban offenders from using public transport in future; and an extension of the role of the British Transport police. Those are the recommendations put forward by the TGWU, of which I am a member, and they are not only practical but pragmatic.

[Jim Sheridan]

I have identified some of the issues and the disciplines affected by violent and abusive assaults. I am sure that colleagues will bring their own views and experiences to this debate, and I thank them for that. The overall problem that still exists is the inability, or indeed the unwillingness, of the judiciary or magistrates to deal effectively with this matter.

I shall put into context my understanding of the current penalty priorities. As things stand, a person is more likely to be heavily sentenced for stealing a mobile phone than for attacking a worker at their workplace—someone who is, after all, only carrying out his or her job. That cannot be right.

As I said at the outset, Government alone cannot solve the problems. They should legislate where needed, but all of society has a responsibility to engage with those affected and to raise public awareness. We must ensure that all our efforts are not undermined by a judiciary that cannot or will not take the issue seriously and impose effective sentencing on the culprits.

9.42 am

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) for raising this important subject. I want to tell the House my experiences with violence at work, not because I am trying to score brownie points or tell an elaborate story, but because it is important that people understand exactly what workers in a profession such as my previous one—nursing—are subjected to. During my first week working in a hospital, I suffered my first attack, which was carried out by a patient suffering from a mental illness. That creates a problem in itself because people suffering from a mental illness may not be in a position where they can be criminally prosecuted for what they do.

I have suffered numerous injuries: I have had a broken leg, both of my collarbones have been dislocated, and I have had numerous black eyes and the usual bumps, bruises and scratches that happen when people work in a hectic nursing environment, whether they work in accident and emergency, with people suffering from mental health problems, with drunks coming in off the street or with people under the influence of drugs. I remember working in Belfast, and it was ironic that I was standing there as a staff nurse in a white uniform having to admit a patient who was in a Land Rover being protected by four policemen with bodyguard stuff, rifles and so on. They let this guy come in, then I had to take over and look after him. That sort of thing happens.

I am not saying that the police do not do a good job; they do, and they suffer from assaults themselves, but the front line of the health service is not protected in the same way as the police. We are not in a position to protect ourselves because if someone is being attacked, there is a lot of ambiguity about the level of restraint they can use and how they can protect themselves. Far less is there any sort of support in the way of administering medication.

My story continues when, later on in my career, I was in charge of a big psychiatric hospital at night. Thankfully, we have moved on from big asylum-type institutions, but in that hospital there were 60 exits and entrances, where any intruder could get access. When I was doing my rounds, I was attacked by an intruder who pushed me to the ground. We do not know why he attacked me—whether it was a sexual thing, whether he was an ex-patient with a grudge, or whether he quite simply wanted to secure the hospital drug keys, which I had. He tried to suffocate me, but thankfully something attracted his attention and he got up and ran off. The police tried to get him. The dogs got the scent, but unfortunately he got away because we were out in the wilderness. With all those exits, he could have gone in any direction and he managed to get away. I spent six months out of work, severely traumatised by the whole event and with a serious injury to my back.

Those are not isolated incidents that people have to go through. I found it quite unbelievable, not so long ago, when the Countryside Alliance was marching and demonstrating in the streets and I tried to get access to my workplace to cast my vote against fox hunting, that I was punched in the face by one of the protestors. I really thought that I had left that level of abuse behind before I came to this job. There is an onus on us as a Government to do something about this issue. There should be strict penalties. Legislation should be brought in to penalise people who are prepared to hurt other people who are just trying to deliver a public service, sometimes against a background of great adversity.

The Scottish Executive have led by example and are consulting at the moment on the protection of emergency workers. I greatly welcome that, but I am concerned about the ambiguity over who is or is not an emergency worker. A nurse going about her ordinary working day in a ward would not necessarily constitute an emergency worker, whereas a nurse attending an accident with the paramedics would. We should have similar legislation, but it should cover all public sector workers who face assault and abuse in the workplace.

Once again, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire for raising this debate. I look forward to hearing the response from the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety. It is admirable that she is here this morning, given the time that she had to put in yesterday. I am sure that she felt under assault herself on many occasions, so she will be quite sympathetic towards us.

9.48 am

Mr. John Lyons (Strathkelvin and Bearsden) (Lab): I join my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) on securing the debate. He reinforced something that all Members know: he is always to the fore when it comes to defending workers' rights. Today is a good example.

We are talking about people who are public servants in the health service, who teach, and who work in public transport and the emergency services. People working in all those areas face violence day in, day out. It would be crass to say that that has become routine to some extent. As part of the debate, we must say that we will never accept that facing violence every day or every shift should be a routine part of a person's job or their contract of employment. There is nothing inevitable about violence. We must try not just to lift awareness, but to clamp down solidly on people who assault public service workers. It is as straightforward and as simple as that.

The evidence is everywhere. There is first-hand evidence from people who are involved, such as my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian, and from others who can tell similar stories, such as firefighters who turn up for a fire and find themselves under a hail of bricks and stones and are assaulted. That is almost a normal part of their job. Much the same situation applies to ambulance staff. They turn up to a very serious accident and are assaulted and abused, verbally and physically. It is a tale that applies across the public sector. No part of that sector is different in any way. All people who work in the public sector face the problem. For example, we heard an Ofsted report on the question of violence against teachers. The problem does not affect just the people whom we would normally expect to be involved in violence—front-line staff—but even people involved in teaching. We need to do everything that we can to protect them.

What is the extent of the problem? The British crime survey said that there are about 1.2 million assaults on public sector staff. If thought of day to day, month to month, or year to year, that is frightening. It is something that we need to report not as a statistic or a figure, but as something that encourages us all, whether we are employers, trade unionists or politicians, to do more. It firmly sets an agenda: we need to make changes to the situation that public sector workers face.

There is greater awareness about public sector staff being assaulted. There are posters on the underground. I congratulate Transport for London and others who are trying to lift awareness of the issues and to involve the public in ensuring that the situation is not accepted as a normal way of life for staff. So employers are doing their bit. There are also trade union campaigns. My hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire referred to the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers and others such as Unison, the Transport and General Workers Union and the Royal College of Nursing. Throughout the TUC, trade unions are interested in protecting their members and rightly so. They have done a lot of work, not just at TUC level but locally, to reinforce the agenda of protection of public sector staff. I, for one, am signed up to that agenda.

There are some specific areas of concern. In its survey of health staff, Unison asked 3,000 staff to give an opinion about what they felt their reaction would be to the situations that they have faced in the past. Among nursing and ambulance staff, there were increases in violence year on year. That is unacceptable but it is the reality. The figures are there. I am sure that other trade unions could repeat those statistics.

The Government have, of course, done a lot on violence at work and assaults on staff. They have developed and implemented a zero-tolerance agenda and policy. However, the problem is that that policy is falling down in certain areas. For example, while 18 per cent. of trusts say that there has been a reduction in the number of assaults on hospital staff, more than 50 per cent. of trusts report that there have been increases of assaults against staff, whether they be nurses, porters or whatever. That statistic should make us worried.

If we manage nothing else in this debate, we should be clear about one thing. All staff should feel safe in the place where they work. There is no question about that. They should feel that they can turn up to work. They should know that they will work for a certain time—be it seven or eight hours—and they must feel that they can work in safety and be under no threat. It must be our aim as politicians to try to bring that to the public sector.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire made a number of points in opening the debate. I think that we have to talk about creating a specific charge of assaulting a public service worker and that the Government will have to move on that. There is no way that the matter can be left without anything being done. We need to develop new legislation so that people are clear that if they assault or abuse a public sector worker, a specific charge will be raised against them.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I understand what the hon. Gentleman said, but is there not a danger that, if there is a specific charge of assault against public service workers, it would leave some people thinking that those in the private sector are second-class citizens, notably, as the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) said, shop workers?

Mr. Lyons: I welcome that point. I am not arguing that we need to protect public service workers and do nothing else, but, if we seriously want to make a practical start, that start needs to be in defending public service workers. They are out there in a way that bears no comparison with many private sector jobs. If we can get the legislation to work in the public sector, I am happy to extend it to the private sector, but we should initially target the problem, which is in the health service, the ambulance service, the emergency services, social work and teaching. We need to concentrate our efforts on the public sector so that people are clear about the charge they would face if they decided to assault someone.

Much is being done, and I compliment the people who are doing it. For instance, closed circuit television is being used more and more in hospitals to protect staff and ensure that they can work safely, and we need to extend such arrangements where we can. I welcome the use of DNA swabs in cases where someone spits at public transport workers. The First group has been using DNA swabs throughout the UK, and they can be used in evidence to prosecute someone who has assaulted or spat on a driver, which is a horrid thing to happen to staff in the course of their daily duties. I welcome those developments, but we need to do more to ensure that they extend across the range.

[Mr. Lyons]

I am quite happy to support this debate and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire on securing it and on giving us all the chance to discuss how best we can protect public service workers.

9.56 am

David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): I intend to raise only one or two points because most of the issues have been covered. I am sure that others will talk about how we develop a strategy that protects people who deliver a service. As has been said, people are entitled to go to work without being assaulted, irrespective of whether they are a shop worker or a public sector worker.

I want to talk about two experiences that I have had to deal with as a local councillor, a Member of Parliament and a local citizen. Several years ago, I was out on a Saturday night, standing by a bus stop with my wife. Some people set about me, and I was so badly injured that I had to be taken to hospital. I was rushed to hospital with concussion, and the doctor tried to patch me up. I had bruised ribs and a cut across my face. The doctor sent me home, but I was in such a condition that my wife had to stay up all night to make sure that I was all right.

I was sent home because, on a Saturday night, the Royal Infirmary was like the OK corral. Drunks and junkies came in regularly, and the police were there in force. I had the luxury of being sent home that night, but the staff had to stay there to deal with things. Some of the staff happened to be constituents of mine, and when I met some of them later, they were worried about me. But they have to deal with assaults that happen on Friday, Saturday and Sunday nights in the town centre, and most city centres have the same problem. It is a sad indictment of our society that the first thing we see when we go to hospital is security guards.

Gone are the days when we would step in to assist someone who was being assaulted on the other side of the road. Nowadays, we are really quite worried about doing that. I have seen shop workers being verbally abused in shops, and I have had to intervene, but we are always wary about doing that, because we do not know what the person who is giving the abuse has been doing. Indeed, one issue has not yet been touched on very much. To someone of my age, drink used to be the major issue, but now it is drugs. When drugs are involved, we do not really know where someone is coming from; indeed, in many cases, that individual does not know where they are. So there is that problem, too.

Jim Sheridan: My hon. Friend makes a valid point about the relationship of drink and drugs to violence at work, and they are all intermingled. However, although drugs are illegal, and we can charge those involved with dealing in drugs, the big problem seems to lie with alcohol. My hon. Friend is right to suggest that hospitals have to pick up the tab after drunks have spent most of their time in licensed premises. Does he not agree, however, that it is time licensed premises made a contribution, given what they are doing to society by feeding young people, in particular, too much alcohol?

David Hamilton: That brings us to the question of ID cards. Just last week in Scotland, other parties decided not to go ahead with ID cards, and I regret that. At the end of the day, it is a simple matter. When I speak to people in my constituency—I stay in the biggest council estate in Midlothian—they wonder why ID cards are not a normal thing.

When I was in America, in Florida, I saw a young couple walk into a bar. They looked to me to be obviously 23 or 24 years old, but the barman asked for an ID card. Afterwards, I said to him that that seemed a bit heavy handed. He said, "Sir, if the cops walk in here today and I am serving somebody who is under age,"—this addresses the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan)—"they will close my bar immediately and it will take me two weeks to open it again. I cannot afford to lose that custom." That was a good point, because one of the benefits of a simple thing such as an ID card is that it protects the shopkeeper and the bar staff and allows them to make that distinction. That is a simple way forward, and ID cards are a good thing in relation to such problems—without our talking about terrorism or anything else.

What I said about hospitals and what they have to suffer is also true of buses. Some cities have no-go areas where the bus companies have withdrawn because of continual stoning. Of course, the police do not have the back-up to be able to put 24-hour coverage into such areas or to form a convoy. I do not want to paint a bleak picture, but that happens throughout society and is due to the change in how we deal with things as parents and as families. It is a major concern. At the back of everything that has been said, including by my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire, is the fact that discipline is lacking in society, which has to be addressed. There are much bigger issues about how we deal with that.

I have a nephew who is a bus driver for First Bus throughout the Midlothian area and in Edinburgh. Not all the buses have a cover to protect the driver. Not all the buses have a radio control frequency; then again, though, a radio control frequency will be helpful only after the event, not before. A man jumped on my nephew's bus, punched him across the jaw, very nearly broke his jaw and jumped back off the bus, all for no apparent reason. Bus drivers are so apprehensive nowadays that if there is a carry-on up the stairs, they will stop the bus and go, to try to get the person off. Back in your young days, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and in mine, if we were up the stairs as kids and were doing something wrong, the bus driver would come up, tell us off and that would be it. It is not like that now. A driver is apprehensive about whether he or she should go up and deal with it.

Two areas of this discussion are really important, and I have seen that because I have been there. When I went to Craigmillar in the south part of Edinburgh, a rough area where major redevelopment is taking place, I saw the fire services coming in and being pelted, and I tried to intervene to stop people. It is kids who do that, and we need to ask why kids are out at 9, 10 or 11 o'clock at night.

I come back to a core problem in society. That problem is about people taking responsibility. We should accept zero tolerance and individuals should be challenged, and families should be challenged, too. Maybe I was too hard on my two girls, and I have five grandkids now, but I do not understand why a 10 or 11-year-old should be out at midnight on a Friday or Saturday. To me, the parents have to be drawn into line. Many of the issues that we are talking about, such as the throwing of stones and so on, involve children. Discipline needs to be put forward.

When we talk about the trade unions—I support many of the trade unions that are trying to do something on behalf of their members—we need to look at joined-up issues. Local authorities, health boards, fire authorities, police boards, local government and the Government, whether the Scottish Executive or the one in Westminster, should have strategy meetings to see how best to combat problems when dealing with people working with the public as part of an overall strategy. That would take care of public sector workers as well as people working with the public, and it would be a step towards meeting people's expectation that they can go to work and not be assaulted.

10.5 am

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) on securing the debate. The contributions made today suggest that we all agree that there are real issues and real problems to be addressed. To be honest, we are all groping for a solution.

As the hon. Member for Midlothian (David Hamilton) said, we need a joined-up approach across several sectors, and although attacks in the workplace are a problem in both the public and the private sectors, they are a particular problem for people whose primary job is to interface with the public. The statistics for the total number of assaults in the workplace are appalling—we are talking about some 800,000 plus assaults. As the Minister will tell us, that figure is lower than previous figures. Nevertheless, 800,000 plus people a year facing assaults at work is unacceptable, even if a relatively small percentage of people have suffered assaults.

It always enriches a debate when hon. Members can cite personal experience. I am glad to say that I do not have any personal experience to bring to the debate, but I was moved by the experiences of the hon. Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking), which make one wonder why people go into nursing if they have to face such treatment. Yet we know why people go into nursing: it is because they care, and they want to serve the community and give something back. They want to do that job. It is a huge and appalling irony that people whose prime work function and objective is to look after people who are mentally or physically sick face such aggression when they are trying to help others. That is simply unacceptable.

The hon. Member for Midlothian mentioned people working in casualty departments. It can make one angry, when we are fighting a hard battle for health service funding and resources, that so many resources are used to deal with self-inflicted wounds brought about by drunkenness and aggravation, rather than being used to deal with genuine illness or accident, which is what the service is there for. We cannot, however, refuse to treat people or to take people in because they are drunk, although we must address the reasons why the problem arises.

The hon. Member for Midlothian and I broadly disagree about ID cards, but I agree with him about their use in combating under-age drinking—indeed, I have actively encouraged that—in circumstances in which the landlord, the publican or the licence holder is obliged to require proof of age before serving someone. The local authority or agency should provide an ID card for people to produce in those circumstances. I have a different view about a national ID card and the data required for it, but ID cards clearly have a role to play, and I support their use in the context that I just described.

David Hamilton: What ID would a young person be able to produce who has never been abroad and has no passport, and whose birth certificate is held in their house or may have been mislaid?

Malcolm Bruce: There are several voluntary schemes. A scheme promoted by the council and the social services in Aberdeenshire and Moray enables young people to apply for such a card, which enables a publican to refuse to serve someone who does not have one. It is not the law, but the licence holder has the legal responsibility, and the legal right, to refuse to serve someone. Several publicans have told me that that is useful and that they wished the scheme was publicised more widely.

The debate about ID cards and the role of identity is not black and white. There is clearly a role for them. We must all produce identity every day for various reasons. Indeed, we are required to produce ID to get into Parliament. Some longer-established Members may claim to find that irksome, but most of us fully understand the reasons for it and are happy to co-operate. I do not want to create dissent, because we agree about the practical role of ID cards.

To return to the central subject of the debate, the Scottish Parliament is, as the hon. Member for East Lothian has said, struggling to some extent with the proposed measure for dealing with violence in the workplace, particularly with respect to public sector workers. I am sympathetic to the intervention made by the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) about the distinction between public and private, although I accept, having read an article in my local paper, The Press and Journal of Aberdeen, that there is a particularly serious problem in the public sector.

The figures show that 67.9 per cent. of occupational injuries in the national health service in Scotland are the result of violence and aggression. That is a pretty appalling statistic. The figure for general practices and surgeries is 54.4 per cent., and among nurses and midwives it is 75.3 per cent. There is clearly a serious problem when the biggest risk of injury to people working in the health service is from violent assault by a patient rather than from an accident at work. That must clearly be tackled.

[Malcolm Bruce]

I want to make a point that is, perhaps, philosophical, and a related practical point. I am not against exploring the possibility of a law. If the Scottish Parliament is pursuing that, I am interested, but it is interesting that it is encountering difficulty in formulating it correctly. However, we should not reach for the idea that we must pass a law and that that will solve the problem. There is a cultural problem to be tackled.

Assault is a criminal offence in any circumstances, so the law exists. People know that it is a criminal offence, but they still perpetrate assaults; that may be because they are drunk, angry, out of control and not thinking; it may be because they think that they will get away with it; or it may be because they are in some other way not engaged. I do not say that there is not a case for a law to protect public sector workers in particular, but it would be wrong to think that we could just pass a law and feel comforted, or even to think that passing a law would materially change the figures. We must change a society in which people feel that it is all right to behave in the way in question.

Jim Sheridan: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. We do not need to make a law when there is already a law for dealing with the issue. However, does he agree that it is not so much the law that is the problem as the judiciary and magistrates? It must be extremely frustrating for police officers to go through the procedures of arresting and charging someone—particularly a young person—and doing all the paperwork, only to find that the offender is back on the street even before the officer concerned. The problem is not so much the law as its application, together with effective sentencing.

Malcolm Bruce: That is a fair point, although the courts will always have to argue about the circumstances of any individual case. However, I agree that part of the process of conveying to people that such behaviour is unacceptable is to make it known that serious penalties exist and that courts take a serious view of the offences and will act accordingly. I appreciate how frustrating it is when that does not happen. The point takes us towards a wider debate, on which the hon. Gentleman has already touched and with which the Minister must deal more closely than any of us: it concerns the general view, which is often uttered although it may or may not be true, that too many of the wrong people are in prison, and too many of the wrong people are outside it.

Anecdotally, in my own circle, the husband of one of my wife's friends has been sentenced to two years' imprisonment, probably perfectly correctly—in fact almost certainly correctly under the law—for causing death by dangerous driving. The case, however, is one of those with very balanced arguments, in which the person in question has come out on the wrong side. As a local police officer said, the law is the law, the man committed the offence and the sentence was appropriate. The officer pointed out, however, that the person in question was not a danger to society. He had done something appalling, with which he would have to live for the rest of his life, and was taking the penalty. However, persistent offenders, who deliberately abuse the law, are not given the same punishment. I am not trying to suggest, should the Minister pick me up on it, that a prison sentence is not appropriate for causing death by dangerous driving, but there are degrees of motivation and engagement. The hon. Member for Midlothian described the Edinburgh Royal infirmary as the OK corral on a Saturday night—

David Hamilton: The old Royal.

Malcolm Bruce: Indeed, but that may be true of casualty departments all over the UK, and it is a sorry situation. To pick up the point about drinking and violence, which is a factor in the workplace too, I wonder whether, as part of the education programme, we might encourage publicans and landlords, and certainly those who have had problems with drunks coming out of their premises, to spend a night in a casualty department. They could see the consequences of serving people who are under age or beyond the point where they have drunk too much, and then letting them out on to the street. We require publicans and landlords to accept responsibility for not fuelling people with drink and then letting them out into situations in which they can cause problems.

I have strayed slightly wide of the debate. We are talking about violence in the workplace and I should like, briefly and finally, to touch on the connection that there can be between a climate of bullying and violence. Bullying is not violence, but it can lead to a climate of violence. An employer who uses bullying-style tactics can create an environment in which violence is likely to occur, not necessarily between employer and employee but among frustrated employees. We have to recognise that bullying is an issue in the workplace. Clearly, responsible employers will take the view that they should be aware of behaviour that might lead to violence in their workplace, and be prepared to act on it.

I totally accept that, although not all workplaces are unionised and not all people are members of trade unions, that is the sort of issue with which the trade union movement has a long and reputable history of engagement. Its approach is to say, "We want employers to understand our problems and to address them, but we will accept responsibility also for engaging with our members to ensure that they understand their responsibilities." There are two issues: violence between the public and people in their workplace, and violence between employees. Both are serious.

I hope that all of us believe effective, efficient, consumer-friendly, compassionate public services are an essential facet of a civilised society and central to the political debate. We have been talking for years about resources for health and education—smaller classes, more teachers, more doctors and more nurses—so that we can have a better ratio between the public and those who serve them. All that is designed to create a better interface and, one hopes, might have contributed a little to the reduction in the number of violent incidents. Nevertheless, if we want to recruit people to be nurses, teachers, doctors and social workers—to serve society—we have an obligation to protect them from violence in the workplace. That is partly because it is right—people should not be subjected to violence, and we should do all we can to lower the incidence—and partly for the practical reason, as I said by implication to the hon. Member for East Lothian, that if we cannot do it and people feel that by taking up those professions they will put themselves in situations in which they might suffer, we will not get people to do the jobs. The hon. Member for West Renfrewshire has done us a great service by initiating this debate, and I welcome that and thank him for it.

10.19 am

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I, too, heartily congratulate the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) on having initiated the debate. We have had some excellent contributions and heard recounted some first-hand experiences. I must declare my interest as a director of a retail outlet; that may explain my somewhat biased attitude toward shop workers. Although director of a retail outlet may sound grand, it is a family business in which I have spent most of my time on the shop floor dealing with members of the public. In such a situation, one is open to whoever should come through the door in whatever state they may be. Dealing with the public is a difficult job.

People, perhaps, do not properly understand how the problem starts with a culture of abuse toward those people who serve us, which may be due to frustration or other reasons. Members of Parliament probably find the public more ready to abuse us straight away, without first bringing their complaints in a more civilised manner. If only people knew that they would be more likely to get a better result if they were to treat public service workers, shop workers, and even Members of Parliament in a more civilised way.

Jim Sheridan: The hon. Gentleman is right to highlight the problem that some members of the general public think that politicians are fair game for verbal or other abuse. Does he agree that an element of that is worked up by some in the popular press who see politicians as fair game for verbal abuse?

Mr. Randall: I agree entirely. Another group of workers who suffer a great deal, but who, by and large, are not in the public sector any longer, are traffic wardens. They are probably held in a similar sort of esteem that is worked up by the media. It may be frustrating if they are what one might call jobsworths, but they are simply doing their jobs. It goes beyond that; recently, an off-duty traffic warden was recognised in a supermarket in Hayes, in the neighbouring constituency, and suffered a severe assault. That is the worst sort of assault.

I agree that people are encouraged to regard a lot of professions as fair game for abuse. I do not think that the media would suggest that people should use violence, but, today's culture starts with abuse and too readily leads to violence. Such actions are often fuelled by alcohol or drugs. In my constituency, although there is considerable drug abuse, alcohol is probably more likely to lead to violence, particularly late in the evening.

The basic protection for everybody should always be the ordinary criminal law, with a proper commitment from management and unions to tackle incidents of violence. Whatever the cause of such incidents, there should be a readiness to call the police. A school may find it difficult to call the police after an assault by a pupil or parent because it feels that that might ruin the relationship between the school and the wider community, but that is nonsense. Every attack on anybody must be reported to the police, and the police must respond appropriately.

Anne Picking: The problem affects different occupations, but is there not a particular problem in that teachers who are attacked or assaulted by children are reluctant to defend themselves because of what could happen to them? It is the same for health professionals when they are attacked by a patient. Sometimes their ability to restrain the patient is limited, because they fear being prosecuted themselves. In all such forms of work, training from the employer to the employee in how to deal with these situations is essential.

Mr. Randall: The hon. Lady is absolutely right. I should declare another bias: my wife was a teacher. I remember that once when she was pregnant she was tripped up maliciously and fell down. Nobody particularly thought that that should be regarded as an incident; it was just one of those things that happens. I was not best pleased, but Members will be happy to know that I usually bow to my wife in everything.

It seems to me that these incidents are increasing. The Minister might have some statistics with regard to what the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) said, but I think that there is a perception that there is an increase. It may be the case that fewer people than in the past are now technically in public service, but attacks seem to be more violent and not just confined to one area—they occur throughout the country.

Members of the nursing profession, and doctors and ancillary workers within the health service, face very serious violence. I cannot understand that, but the hon. Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) described it very clearly, and I know that it happens. That is appalling. I am also aware of the experiences of bus drivers and transport workers. When I speak to bus drivers, they tell me that the time they fear most is when the schools finish for the day, which is a great worry. Before I looked into this matter, I naively thought that the time they would fear most would be late at night, but far from it.

We might be able to tackle that problem that arises when the schools finish a little more easily than some others. A bus driver I know told me about something that happened to him when he was driving during the day near Shepherd's Bush. A smart-looking car cut him up. He just stopped the bus—he didn't hoot his horn or do anything else like that—and the driver of the car climbed out and approached him. The bus driver wound down his window, and the driver of the car hit him straight in the face, breaking his nose, and then drove off. That happened in the middle of the day. I am afraid that that is where some sections of society seem to have got to. There is a lot of frustration in some jobs.

Jim Sheridan: The hon. Gentleman is right that many bus drivers are terrified of the school run, and particularly of the journey home after school. One solution that has been piloted may be worth while: parents are encouraged to travel back from school on those buses. First, that lets them know how their young darlings are behaving, and secondly, and perhaps more importantly, it stops parents driving their 4x4's to the playgrounds to pick up their kids.

[Jim Sheridan]

Mr. Randall: The hon. Gentleman is right on both counts.

The point about letting parents see what is going on leads me on to something that I have always thought would be helpful, particularly from my viewpoint from behind the counter, as it were. If more people had served the public and seen the public in action, they would probably be a little more sympathetic in their dealings with public service workers and shop assistants. It is necessary to spend some time on the other side of the fence in order to realise how awkward, difficult and unpleasant people can be.

In the past, violence in the workplace sometimes arose out of industrial problems, although I am pleased to say that that is very rare now. We have only to look back to the miners' strike to see that serious violence can arise at certain times. Happily, I think that those days of real confrontation have gone, and that is to the credit of all sides involved.

There are more subtle pressures, and the hon. Gentleman talked about bullying. Racial bullying can lead to violence. Often, the frustration of the person being bullied eventually boils over and leads to violence in the workplace, and that is where management has a strong role to play by monitoring and ensuring that those incidents do not happen. It is important to recognise that within the workplace there are traditions that must be eradicated—a macho tradition in some cases. As I have said before, employers have a duty of care. Although they cannot shoulder the burden of fighting lawlessness on their own, they have a responsibility to provide reasonable external security against intruders—however regrettable that might seem in a civilised society. Unfortunately it seems to be a fact of life. Employers have a duty to ensure that women do not work singly and in potentially difficult environments, and they also have a duty to provide adequate back-up to those staff who are exposed on the front line.

As the hon. Gentleman said, training people to handle violent incidents with the minimum of counter-force is extremely relevant. We have to recognise that more training must be done by management. There are ways of trying to calm people down, although not necessarily when they are fuelled with alcohol or drugs, as that must create a very difficult situation.

As we have heard, the problem under discussion reflects a wider malaise in society. The fact that we see security personnel in hospitals, shops, all sorts of other places and even schools reflects something about which we must all be worried—the culture of violent confrontation. I see it on my television screen much more than I used to. People are growing up with the idea that the way to settle an argument is to shout loudly, and eventually that will lead to violence. We all have a responsibility to try to stop that, and we have to clamp down on it. The police must respond and they must have the resources.

This is so easy to say, and I am sure that we all say it, however discipline and the respect for—not deference to—authority must start in school and in the home. I am not sure how we achieve it and I am not sure that we can legislate for it, but we must all work hard to do so. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on giving us an opportunity to discuss the problem, and I hope that we can return to the subject to see how we are doing.

10.33 am

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I confess that after yesterday's business, the prospect of an hour and a half's Adjournment debate this morning did not exactly fill me with joy. Having listened to the debate, however, I think it has been one of the best that I have been at for a while. It has raised an important issue, which has been addressed in a practical and thoughtful way by all Members. I hope that I can add something to it, because I have thought about this issue for some time. It is an important area to be concerned about.

I thank in particular my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) for raising the issue. He has a good record of raising issues of concern to people in the workplace. He had a private Member's Bill on protecting people who have been exploited by gangmasters, which links to this morning's agenda of ensuring that people can go about their day-to-day work without fear of harassment, alarm, distress or violence.

My hon. Friend mentioned the work of a range of trade unions: the Transport and General Workers Union, GMB, Unison and the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. All trade unions are concerned that workers should be protected and able to go about their lawful business.

Various hon. Members have raised specific groups of workers, including shop workers, firefighters and other emergency personnel. I will comment on those issues, but first I want to deal head-on with whether a new offence is needed and whether the law should be changed. Consultation is going on in Scotland, and I have thought about the issue quite deeply. My starting point is that the existing criminal law should usually be applied to people who commit offences of violence, whether that is assault, wounding, grievous bodily harm, violent disorder or affray. There is a framework in the existing criminal law to deal with various levels of violence. I am reluctant to go down the path of a specific offence for public sector or emergency workers, because there would be difficulties in defining people in a way that allowed us to tackle the mischief that we are trying to tackle. A specific offence could be too rigid. People might fall just outside the boundary, and then we would then have a legal system that was unfair to different sets of workers.

The right approach is the one that we have taken recently. Perhaps hon. Members are not fully aware of it and it is not yet making an impact in the courts, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire said. The Criminal Justice Act 2003 established the Sentencing Guidelines Council, which is charged with drafting and distributing consolidated sentencing guidelines applicable throughout all criminal courts in England and Wales. The purpose of the guidelines is to ensure consistency—the exact point raised—and to require the courts to take account of all the relevant aggravating or mitigating features of a case. The council has issued guidelines on determining the seriousness of an offence, which refer explicitly to the fact that a victim was at the time of the offence providing a service to the public as being an aggravating feature. That is a better definition than referring to a public sector or emergency worker, because we may be talking about people working in shops or in a privatised transport undertaking. If such people are subject to assault, grievous bodily harm, violent disorder or affray while providing a service to the public, that should be an aggravating factor when the case comes before the courts, and the penalty should be more serious.

David Hamilton: I shall not mention the miners strike; it was unfortunate that the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) made a digression on that.

How will the message outlined by the Minister translate to the public? It will be some time before cases go through the courts, but the public must be made aware now that zero tolerance is the issue. I travelled on a bus in Nevada last year, and there was a big sign on every bus there saying that there would be a $1,000 fine for any assault on a driver. The public there know right away that they will be treated harshly if they assault a driver. Judging by the Minister's description of our system, however, it will take some time for the message to filter through to the public.

Ms Blears: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. I do not think that there is wide awareness that the guidelines exist. The national health service has had a big campaign on zero tolerance of violence against NHS workers. Many NHS trusts have schemes whereby there is a yellow card and then a red card and people can be banned from services. Posters have been put up and there has been publicity, but we must do much more to get across to the public the message that if someone who is serving the public is assaulted, the penalty is likely to be more severe than in other circumstances. My hon. Friend makes a serious point about the need for more publicity. The "freedom from fear" campaign run by USDAW was excellent. It went to virtually every shopping centre in the country and involved workers, consumers and the shops themselves. It was an example to us all of how to get the message across that violence at work will not be tolerated.

The Government believe that prison is the proper place for dangerous and violent offenders. I want to be very clear about that. That is why we have created some new offences, particularly for dangerous offenders, which involve an indeterminate sentence. Their risk to the public will be determined when they come up for parole, and if they are deemed still to be a risk, they will stay in prison. We have a much stronger sentencing framework to ensure that violent and dangerous prisoners are not released to continue assaulting others.

I am also able to tell the House that 9 per cent. more people convicted of violence against the person last year were given custodial sentences than in the previous year, so there is some evidence that the courts are beginning to take violent crime more seriously.

Mr. Randall: I genuinely do not know the answer to this question, but are more people being convicted because more crimes are being committed or are there simply more convictions?

Ms Blears: In fact, violent crime has fallen dramatically—by about 30 per cent. in the last few years—and the figures are now relatively stable. I was saying that 9 per cent. more of those who are convicted now receive a custodial sentence, when they might previously have been given a conditional discharge or a suspended sentence.

The courts are taking the matter more seriously. However, I think that my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire was right: we need to ensure that magistrates are fully aware of aggravating circumstances. It has long been a passion of mine that magistrates should come from a wider cross-section of the community. Many magistrates do a sterling job, but I know that in my area they tend to come from the more affluent and better-off parts of the community. Rarely do they come from the inner city where many of the problems of crime, disorder and antisocial behaviour happen. The Department for Constitutional Affairs is running a big campaign to try to recruit more locally based magistrates. That would certainly help us to get issues of this kind taken more seriously by the courts.

As well as levying punishments on those involved in violence, it is important also to engage in preventive work; it should be everyone's aim that no one is assaulted at work. Enforcement by the police is important, but we must work with the Health and Safety Executive and companies to train and to spread good practice. The HSE has been running a three-year work programme to try to reduce the incidence of violence at work, and it has commissioned research to find examples of good practice. That research is now on its website and is being made available to industry.

The HSE has funded the development of new national occupational standards in the management of workplace-related violence. Those standards are aimed particularly at small businesses, which often find it difficult to deal with such issues, perhaps because they do not have the management infrastructure of larger companies. It is obviously important to help small and medium-sized enterprises as well as large ones.

Work is also being done on protecting people who work alone. The one person working in the late-night corner shop is particularly vulnerable. We must ensure that premises are designed in a way that minimises the prospect of people being assaulted, including the installation of closed circuit television, alarm systems, and radio networks so that people can call for immediate support. Such things can be designed into premises from the beginning.

We are also supporting a range of retail and business crime partnerships; 100 are already established, and we are working to set up another 100. Last week, I visited the Dudley partnership in Halesowen. It has a tremendous scheme in its shopping centre; photographs of known prolific offenders are circulated to a network of all staff, so that they can warn each other that one of those persons is in the shopping centre and might come into their shop. People can thus be prepared and take action in anticipation. Those partnerships enable people to help themselves, but they also allow them to call for immediate help—from a security guard in the shopping centre, from the local police, and increasingly from the community support officers who patrol such areas.

[Ms Blears]

Mr. Randall: Having had one those schemes that notify people of known troublemakers wandering around the town, I know that when one sees such a person entering premises, the problem is confronting them. That often leads to more trouble, but because nothing has yet happened, the police do not really want to know.

Ms Blears: I say two things to the hon. Gentleman. The staff in the Dudley partnership to whom I spoke felt very able to tackle such people. They did it politely and firmly, and found that, overwhelmingly, people simply left the premises. The staff felt that they were well supported, as they could call on security staff, the police and community support officers. People who were subject to an exclusion order did not need to commit a crime but could simply be excluded, and the staff felt that the system worked extremely well.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Anne Picking) graphically set out in a moving speech the problems in the health service. It is an irony of the worst kind that people who dedicate their lives to caring for others should far too often be on the receiving end of abuse and violence. Several Members discussed the links between alcohol and binge drinking and the way in which people, particularly those who work in the NHS, are subjected to violence. Our research shows that about half of violent crime is linked to alcohol and that some 70 per cent. of accident and emergency visits at the weekend between midnight and 5 am are the result of alcohol. That is the reason for our massive campaign to tackle binge drinking.

The police have undertaken two big enforcement campaigns this year and have issued fixed penalty notices under their powers to disperse groups and close premises. The Government have just issued a consultation document on the possibility of setting up alcohol disorder zones in which the industry will have to make a contribution towards the cost of dealing with crime and disorder, and we are consulting on banning orders under which people who deliberately go out to drink to excess and then become violent could be banned for a period from drinking in a vicinity. Such issues must be tackled urgently.

I was struck by the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (David Hamilton) about the American experience. He mentioned a bar that the police could walk in and immediately close. That is exactly the kind of power that we seek to obtain. Such short, sharp intervention really does concentrate minds and can start to change behaviour in the long term. There is almost nothing more important to us at present than tackling the binge drinking that has become the blight of many of our town and city centres.

David Hamilton: I appreciate the Minister's comments. Five Members in the Chamber are Scottish Members, and they are concerned about many of the things that she has mentioned. What discussions have taken place with the Scottish Executive to take on some of the pilots in England and Wales to which she referred?

Ms Blears: Policing and enforcement is a devolved matter in Scotland, but I have detailed discussions and a good relationship with the Scottish Ministers on these issues. I saw in the Scottish newspapers today that Scotland is as exercised about the problems of binge drinking as England and Wales are. We can share our good practice, particularly the enforcement campaigns that our police have run, which have been innovative. They used the whole range of fixed penalty notice powers to deliver on-the-spot, short, sharp shocks. I am perfectly happy to share the information and good practice that we have developed from that experience.

The British crime survey shows that there has been a fall in the number of incidents of workplace-related violence in England and Wales. It was 1.3 million in 1999 and is down to 850,000. That fall is significant, but we certainly are not complacent. We must work hard to maintain the downward trend.

Various initiatives involve working with employers; for example, training programmes. Workplace inspections that are targeted at NHS trusts and nursing homes can be useful. Inspectors can go in and determine what procedures are in place to minimise the chance of violence happening. There is improved advice and information for health and safety inspectors, and a specific project with the railway industry that involves targeted investigations of known areas of weakness. My hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire discussed the important contribution of the British Transport police, who do some excellent work in this area. Railway workers, like bus workers, are particularly vulnerable to assault.

My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Lyons) raised issues around fire and ambulance staff. One of the saddest things in our society is that firefighters who turn up to save lives are abused and sometimes stoned by children as young as seven, eight or nine years old. That is symptomatic of the wider malaise—the breakdown in decency and standards of behaviour—that all hon. Members have raised.

I know that, in many areas, the fire service has started to run projects. It runs one in my community, where the firefighters work with young people to try to get some discipline back into how they behave. Some projects have been incredibly successful. There are junior firefighters, aged 10, 11 and 12 years old, who now appreciate what the fire service is trying to do. They understand that it is saving lives and that it could save the lives of their own families, and they are much less likely to abuse firefighters in the way that happened previously.

I recently visited a project in south London, where the fire service is helping some of our most difficult young people. The fact that it is a uniformed service, but that its members are not the police has given the firefighters a real relationship with some of those young people. They have ended up mentoring them and trying to show them a different way of life. However, it is a pretty sad state of affairs when our fire service finds itself having to do that to counter the violence that is raised against it.

I want to raise the issue of antisocial behaviour because everything that we have been talking about falls very much in that category. One of the things that I have been working on with USDAW, in relation to "freedom from fear", is trying to get authorities to use antisocial behaviour orders in those circumstances. They can be the most useful tool. If an antisocial behaviour order that excludes or restricts people from going into a shopping centre or a medical facility, such as a hospital or a GP's practice, is breached, that can carry a custodial sentence. That can be a useful tool for reducing violence. In addition, the dispersal orders available under the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 have been used 400 times since they were brought in. They can bring calm and peace to an area that is out of control. We also now have parenting orders. It is important to try to ensure that parents are involved and take responsibility for the behaviour of their children. If parenting orders can be attached to antisocial behaviour orders, it is a criminal offence if they are breached. Using the whole range of powers available to the police and local authorities to tackle antisocial behaviour is really important.

I appreciate the concern of the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) on these issues. The way that he expressed that concern was heartfelt. He said that we must make a cultural change in our society. I am not making a party political point, but, yet again, I feel that the Liberal Democrats will an end—a better society—but are not prepared to will the means. Those means must include using antisocial behaviour powers and saying, "These are the norms of behaviour we expect in our society and if you transgress them, there will be sanctions. There are boundaries, and there are consequences to your actions." One of the reasons why we have a breakdown in decency in our society is because people do not feel that there will be any consequences to their actions, and some people feel that they are untouchable by the authorities. That must end. We are making huge inroads into that and have seen a massive expansion in the use of antisocial behaviour powers. I really wish that Members who want to see a better society would also be prepared to support some of the tools that we have put on the statute book for the police and local authorities to use.

Malcolm Bruce: As the Minister knows, our home affairs spokesman has modified his position on that, and that is fine and good. My point about the cultural change, however, is that we must get at the root cause of why people are behaving as they are and change their behaviour patterns. With the greatest respect to the Minister, whatever the role of antisocial behaviour orders, they do not do that. They are a sanction. We must go into the issue more deeply and ask why people feel that they can behave as they do. There is a variety of measures, for which we could probably get cross-party support, that would deliver results. There are good examples. As the Minister will know, my noble Friend, Baroness Linklater has introduced a number of radical proposals, which I hope the Government will consider.

Ms Blears: The hon. Gentleman knows very well that our strategy for tackling antisocial behaviour is a twin-track strategy and involves enforcement and support. That is what is beginning to make a difference in our communities.

Mr. Lyons: The Minister makes a proper point. The public expect their councils to use antisocial behaviour orders. East Dunbartonshire council—it happens to be Liberal controlled, but that is neither here nor there—refuses to issue antisocial behaviour orders. The public feel let down by the council to some extent. There are lots of issues across the council, but there is a failure to use the orders.

Ms Blears: I am afraid that that picture is still too widespread. Many authorities are using the powers, but my message to others is that they are responsible to the communities that they serve. The powers are on the statute book, and we have to use them to make a difference.

My hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian raised important issues concerning ID cards and the idea of people not being able to obtain alcohol without proof of age. I am absolutely committed to ensuring that we have a good, robust framework in place. It will be a couple of years before we have the formal ID cards with biometric identifiers, but even now there is a lot more that we can do to ensure that young people produce a driving licence, a passport or a pass card—an officially approved proof-of-age card with a hologram on it, which makes it difficult to forge.

We need a big campaign that will start to change the whole culture so that young people expect to be challenged when they want to buy alcohol. No ID should mean no sale, which will help to protect many people serving in shops and ensure that alcohol does not get into the hands of very young people, which leads to some of the problems we see now. I am working actively on that with the industry to ensure that we have a big publicity campaign of the sort described by my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian. If we change the balance so that people expect to be challenged, we will be able to minimise the violence that goes on.

We are tackling not just antisocial behaviour but prolific offenders. Many of the people who undertake violence against people in the workplace would fall into our category of prolific offenders, and a huge amount of our work is focused on three strands: trying to deter and prevent prolific offenders, catching and convicting them when they are offending, and resettling and rehabilitating them when they come out of custody. Breaking the cycle of violent crime is very important.

The debate has been tremendous. It has certainly re-energised me to ensure that I get my officials to focus on some of the issues. My hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire raised some detailed issues, particularly in relation to transport. I have not been in a position to respond to him about those today, but I have asked my officials to liaise with other Departments where necessary, and I would be more than happy to write to him in detail to deal with the specific issues he raised.

[Ms Blears]

Jim Sheridan: Will the Minister clarify whether ASBOs can be used in schools, given that teachers are becoming ever more worried about kids taking knives into school?

Ms Blears: The conditions that can be put in an antisocial behaviour order are designed to prevent the particular behaviour from happening in future, and those restrictions can cover a range of issues. I see no reason why some conditions could not be specifically aimed at the sort of violence that takes place in schools in order to restrict it. ASBOs are being used in fairly imaginative ways, and I am delighted about that. They have been used to exclude certain people from hospitals, and used in a similar way in shopping areas. I see no reason why we could not use some conditions—not necessarily exclusion, because we want young people to go to school—to deal with behaviour in school, which may well help teachers.

I say to the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) that we have police officers working in a number of secondary schools who are part of the education team. Where those police officers are working closely with head teachers, teachers and children, they are building relationships and starting to get decent behaviour back into schools, because the police officer is now a respected figure of authority. Getting some figures of authority back into our communities is vital. Far too many were stripped out in the name of efficiency in years gone by. Getting inspectors, park rangers, wardens, and community support officers out there, and saying what the norms of behaviour are, should help to tackle some of the important issues raised by hon. Members today.

Port of Liverpool Police

11 am

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): I am delighted to have secured the opportunity to speak today about a question to which I have been trying to get a clear answer for four years, and I am grateful to the Minister for attending the debate to answer the concerns of my constituents who belong to the port of Liverpool police. I hope that he will be able to help my constituents to resolve their inequitable situation. I am delighted that, after trying for many years, we have a Minister present who is willing to answer for the employment rights of the port of Liverpool police.

Despite the efforts of the police officers of the port of Liverpool in contacting their Members of Parliament, attending meetings, filing a joint case to an employment tribunal and contacting Ministers, they have been unable to make any headway on the issue of their employment rights. I start by paying tribute to their efforts, because their dedication and determination to achieve appropriate redress has been second to none. I hope that the Minister and other Members will join me in praising those efforts.

In order to understand the situation of the port police officers fully, it is necessary to provide some background information. The port of Liverpool police is a non-Home Office police force funded by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company. The force was founded in 1974 to provide dedicated police cover for the port of Liverpool. It is constituted in the Mersey Docks and Harbour (Police) Order 1975. It has identical legislative powers to those of any other police force in the geographical area of the port, plus special powers granted by the port of Liverpool's byelaws. However, despite the responsibility and risk that the officers of the port of Liverpool police face, it is not a force covered by the police Acts.

As a result, its officers are not afforded the same protection as Home Office police forces if they have a grievance against their employer. If a port of Liverpool police officer has an employment grievance, there is an internal investigation of the complaint. The case is then referred to a port superintendent, on to the port's chief officer and finally to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company police committee. No external redress is available to port police officers.

It is possible that the Minister believes that external redress exists in the form of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company police committee. However, that committee is chaired by the chief executive of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company. The committee does have some external representation, but it could hardly be called independent of the owning company—the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company—against which individuals may have a legitimate grievance. By comparison, a Home Office police officer who has an employment grievance would have access to internal redress in their force. They would then have a right of appeal to the Home Secretary, a tribunal, the divisional court—if the matter was about a point of law—and, finally, the House of Lords.

Port of Liverpool police officers do not have access to a union. As with other police forces, a federation exists to represent their views, but since the port police is a smaller force, the federation has no funding, no office space and no paid officials. It is extremely difficult for a port police officer to access advice and achieve appropriate redress.

I am sure that hon. Members will be surprised to learn that, despite the port of Liverpool police having been refused the routes of external redress offered to other police officers, when it appealed to an employment tribunal, that appeal channel was refused. On 8 March 2002, the decision of the employment tribunal in the cases of 18 police officers of the Port of Liverpool v. the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company was that "All of the applicants were employed under contracts of employment in police service and accordingly their claims are dismissed."

The tribunal cited section 200 of the Employment Rights Act 1996, in which it is stated that the Act does "not apply to employment under a contract of employment in police service or to persons engaged in such service."

That section of the law applies because the port of Liverpool police was constituted by an enactment in the 1975 order that brought it into being.

So there exists an anomaly whereby the officers of the port of Liverpool police are not covered by the police Acts and do not have recourse to an industrial tribunal. They are left at the mercy of their employer, as they have no access to an external independent tribunal. The grievances that the port police officers have tried to raise include claims of unfair dismissal, unfair pension agreements and unfair treatment over sick leave. When injured, some of them have not been able to claim sick pay, and they have been suspended without pay or threatened with dismissal. They are being exploited, and we have not been able to help them, since no one will take responsibility for their employment rights.

The men involved in that case and their families have tried to seek redress via all appropriate means. They have pursued their employment grievances appropriately through the internal system. They made attempts to seek redress as police officers, and once that was refused they attempted to seek redress through the employment tribunal system as members of the public.

Those men have sought legal advice and taken out joint legal insurance to provide quality advice equally to all port police officers who signed up to it. When all their personal efforts failed, they contacted their Members of Parliament and Ministers, and I am ashamed to say that we have not managed to achieve anything on their behalf. In August 2001, I met my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Benton) and the then Home Office Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham). We were informed that the port of Liverpool police fell under the auspices of the then Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions. My right hon. Friend the then Minister replied stating that the Department's remit covered legislation relating to the port police, but did "not extend to the employment terms and conditions of port police officers."

A little frustrated, I sought clarification from the then Leader of the House of Commons, my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). He assured me that the Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions was undertaking a review of the powers, duties and standards of the port police forces. Unfortunately, that review appears to have done nothing to improve the situation of the port police officers. Along with several colleagues I sought further meetings with Ministers, and in 2004 I received assurances from the Home Office that the Green Paper "Policing: Building Safer Communities Together" would explore whether anything could be done to help to rationalise small specialist forces such as the port of Liverpool police. Again, despite that assurance, the Police Reform Act 2002 and the 2004 White Paper "Building Communities, Beating Crime . . ." have not addressed port police. It would appear that no Department will take responsibility for the employment rights of the port police officers, yet we are happy to receive their protection. That is unacceptable.

On 10 February 2004, the Minister responsible responded to the complaints of one of my constituents by referring to the circulation of a ports police discussion paper. The paper was supposed to have been circulated before the Minister sent the letter. When my office tried to obtain the paper over a year after the letter was sent, we were told that it was still in draft form. I hope to receive a copy of the paper from the Department for Transport after this debate. That is typical of the evasive way that this issue has been dealt with. There is no clear information available, and Ministers have avoided this sticky and exceptional problem for far too long.

So far, all that my constituents have gained from their active engagement with the Government is the knowledge that the Department for Transport has legislative control of their police force, but it does not have any duty regarding the day-to-day operations of the police or their employment conditions. That knowledge has achieved nothing. Despite numerous reviews and consultations, if the port of Liverpool police officers have a grievance, they are still at the mercy of their employer. I would like the Minister to address the questions of why no Department has taken responsibility for that situation and why there is still no external accountability procedure for the grievances of the port of Liverpool police officers. They find themselves in the invidious position of neither being in the care of the police nor having access to the legitimate rights of normal employees.

The employment rights of the port of Liverpool police leave much to be desired, and yet, as I mentioned at the start of my speech, under legislation they have the same powers within the port as any other police force in the country. The nature of the crimes that they face has escalated from petty theft to serious organised crime, illegal immigration and a potential terrorist attack. I am sure that I do not need to remind Members that 37 port police officers were killed in the terrorist attacks on New York in September 2001.

Port police officers are as vulnerable to serious organised crime as any other police officers. Some would say that the port police are even more vulnerable, as they patrol our borders. Port police officers who have complaints should be treated with fairness and respect, as is fitting for those who risk their lives in order to protect ours. Does the Minister agree that port security is vital for national security, and that the role of the port of Liverpool police is therefore very important?

[Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas]

Finally, what will the Minister do to ensure that the discrepancy between the grievance procedures for police forces and for the port of Liverpool police is harmonised? As matters stand, their procedure is unfair, and, despite the best efforts of the officers concerned, we have not rectified that disparity in five years of continuous struggle. I ask the Minister to assure my constituents that he, as a Minister with responsibility for transport, will take personal responsibility for this, and that he will ensure that in future they will be treated with the fairness that they have earned through their service to this country.

11.11 am

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): I shall be brief, as my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) has covered the ground very fully. I congratulate her on securing the debate, and on the comprehensive and lucid way in which she introduced the subject.

I have with me a letter from a constituent of mine, Mr. David Hayes. He is a former port of Liverpool police officer who lives in Aintree. In his letter, he sets out his dilemma and that of his colleagues, and he puts it in context:

"On the advice of local Members of Parliament we applied for a hearing at an Employment Tribunal and a pre trial hearing was held at the Employment Tribunal Offices in Liverpool to decide if they could hear our case. Unfortunately the Tribunal decided that they could not hear our case under Section 200 subsection 2(a) of the Employment Rights Act 1996 which states 'section 137 does not apply to employment under a contract of employment in police service or to persons engaged in such service'."

It then goes on to define what "police service" means.

The fact of the matter is that, for purposes of central Government, these men are not treated as police officers. For normal serving police officers, there is an appeal procedure for grievances that can go all the way up to the Home Secretary. That procedure does not apply for these men, but when they go to a tribunal in order to determine whether they are covered by other legislation, they are told that they are not because they have the title of "police."

I realise that the Minister and the Government face a conundrum in how to deal with this matter, but I echo what my hon. Friend said: if these men are not policemen, but they are called policemen and are thereby denied the right to go through a tribunal process in the same way that people in any other form of employment would be, there is a gap that needs to be closed. I am relaxed about whether it is closed by my hon. Friend the Minister, the Home Office or the Department of Trade and Industry, but I hope that Ministers from all three Departments will put their heads together, decide who is going to do it, and then get on with it.

11.14 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) on raising the employment rights of the port of Liverpool police, and on making her points with her customary thoroughness and courtesy. My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) succinctly put his points on behalf of his constituents. I am also pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Benton) is present; he has taken a great interest in these matters.

The port of Liverpool is one of the United Kingdom's top 20 ports. In 2003, it handled almost 32 million tonnes of traffic, which is more than either Felixstowe or Dover. I am told that the total tonnage of cargo passing through the port is at an all-time high—higher, even, than in the port's heyday in the 19th century. The volume of traffic continues to grow, so the port is a major contributor to the renewed vitality of Merseyside. My hon. Friend the Member for Crosby is to be congratulated on having such a successful port in her constituency. The port, which is owned and operated by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company, is responding to new growth. In the past five years, it has invested more than £100 million, including £25 million on expanding and upgrading the Seaforth container terminal in which my hon. Friend has had a considerable interest. She will know that we have been given notice of an application for the further extension of the terminal, and are about to give our opinion on the environmental information that must accompany the application for the order.

The port activities of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company are well known, but it is also a direct employer of the port of Liverpool police force, which was established under the Mersey Docks and Harbour (Police) Order 1975. The order provides for the appointment of constables, with powers, within the port of Liverpool and one mile of its limits. It also provides for the establishment of a port of Liverpool police federation to represent the interests of the appointed constables "in all matters affecting their welfare and efficiency".

Port of Liverpool police officers are employees of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company. The port police forces are established under section 79 of the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act 1847 or, as in the case of Liverpool, the incorporation of a similar section into their own legislation by way of the Mersey Docks and Harbour (Police) Order 1975.

As announced in our policy paper "Modern Ports: A UK policy", we have carried out an initial review of the arrangements for port police in England and Wales. The review has examined the powers, duties and accountability of port police forces. It has not, however, considered the employment terms and conditions of individual forces or officers. Indeed, it never intended to do so, as terms and conditions of employment are not a matter for my Department.

Our draft discussion paper on the accountability and standards of the port police forces was circulated in 2003 to the association of port police chief officers and the Home Office. We learned during that exercise that other initiatives in play had the potential to have an impact on our own work and would therefore have delayed action until their outcomes were known.

Mr. George Howarth: My hon. Friend said, in effect, that his Department did not believe that it was responsible for the employment conditions of the port police. Why, then, is he replying to this debate?

Mr. Jamieson: I asked the same question. I often wonder why I reply to some debates, but here I am, speaking on behalf of my Department and the Government. Unfortunately, several issues do relate to ports and to my Department. Some employment issues, however, are for the Department of Trade and Industry, not for my Department, and police issues are, of course, for the Home Office. If hon. Members want certain issues to be clarified, they may want to seek an audience with the appropriate Ministers or call a debate and draw another Minister to the House. I can speak only for my Department and about issues that relate to my Department, although I may be able to help my hon. Friend if I have time.

The first initiative was the Home Office's public consultation paper "Policing: Building Safer Communities Together", which refers briefly to small specialist police forces such as the port police. Although several responses to the consultation strongly emphasised the positive contribution of the specialist police forces, the subsequent policy paper "Building Communities, Beating Crime—A better police service for the 21st century", which was published in November 2004, made no specific recommendation in respect of the non-Home Office police forces. It has not, so far, seen a need to force through change in that area.

Mr. Joe Benton (Bootle) (Lab): I return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) about the Department's not being responsible. The Minister will recall that, I think it was in 2002, my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) and I met him. It comes as a surprise to discover this morning that the Department for Transport has no responsibility in that regard, because that was the main thrust of that meeting.

Mr. Jamieson: I recall that meeting. At the time we were talking about our review. However, conditions of employment are, ultimately, matters for the DTI.

The Association of Chief Police Officers port group has launched its own review of port policing, with the aim of ensuring that port police forces are fully integrated into the national policing structure. It has drawn on our initial discussion paper and we, in turn, want to ensure that any conclusions from our paper are take into account. Once the outcomes of the other initiatives are known, we will decide whether the outstanding issues merit our proceeding with the planned full consultation on ports policing.

We recognise that port police forces such as that in Liverpool have an important role to play in the security of ports. I concur with what my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby said on that. I am pleased to say that the port of Liverpool successfully met the deadline of 1 July 2004 for implementing the international ship and port facility security code. The port of Liverpool is a diverse operation, so the challenge of complying with the new security requirements was significant, and port employees deserve every credit for their efforts in securing that compliance.

The ports police unit typified the commitment of the port of Liverpool, and was at the forefront of implementing the ISPS security measures. That proactive approach has continued beyond 1 July 2004, and the ports police and the port are participating in a pilot project to determine whether the multi-agency threat and risk assessment programme, which has been successfully rolled out for airports, is relevant to the maritime sector.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend is saying, but it does not seem to have much relevance to the subject, which is the employment rights of the port of Liverpool police. Is he able to say anything about the consolidation of the employment rights of the port of Liverpool police that would give them parity either with the police forces or with other employees of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company?

Mr. Jamieson: I shall see whether, in my latter remarks, I can get to those points. My hon. Friend has, on a number of occasions, raised with me the concerns of her constituents relating to employment rights and operational matters within the port of Liverpool police. I have advised her that my Department has no remit in those matters, and I am afraid that I have to repeat that message today.

Retirement ages are, like other terms and conditions of employment, a matter for negotiation and agreement between employers and their employees, or their representatives. Unless they discriminate on the grounds of sex, race or disability, or between comparable part-timers and full-timers, employers are free to decide the retirement policies best suited to their business needs, and can require employees to retire at a particular age if that is a condition of their employment.

Once terms and conditions of employment are agreed, they form a contract that is legally binding on both parties. Employees whose contracts are varied without their consent, for instance by a requirement to retire at a different age from the one originally agreed, may be able to seek redress through the civil courts or employment tribunals.

Employees have the right to redress through employment tribunals when employment rights conferred by the Employment Rights Act 1996 are infringed. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East pointed out, section 200(1) excludes employees who are under a contract of employment in the police service from many rights conferred under the Act. There thus appears to be an anomaly whereby the terms and conditions of service of ports police are not regulated, and the officers have no recourse to investigation of their perceived unfair treatment by their employers.

I understand that in Liverpool, at least, informal arrangements have been made for such issues to be referred to an independent third party. Again, because the issue is one of employment, my Department cannot intervene in it directly. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby has made a pertinent point, overall, which has been picked up in the review. I hope that she will appreciate that we have not wanted to pursue each issue as it has arisen, without the chance to have it considered as part of the usual consultation process.

[Mr. Jamieson]

I recognise, however, that because the review has been delayed, for the reasons that I have given, the chance to deal with the point has been put back. Therefore, ahead of the review and armed with the arguments that have been made today, I undertake to raise the apparent gap in employment protection with my colleagues in the DTI and the Home Office, although of course I cannot guarantee the precise outcome that my hon. Friend requires. The issue will no doubt have to compete for priority with all the other policing issues, but I undertake that my Department will explore with the company the possibility of a local solution to the problem.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: If it is my hon. Friend's intention to explore that opportunity with the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company I welcome that, but I want to ensure that any independent body is independent of employees or employer or the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company. Anything else would clearly compromise the position of an employee bringing a case to the independent panel.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes; I have undertaken that we will work closely with the DTI and the Home Office in investigating the matter to see how we can take things forward. My hon. Friend will appreciate my difficulty today in that I cannot speak directly for those Departments; the matters in question are not in the control of my Department. We shall also make contact with the company to see whether a solution can be reached.

The difficulty, also, is that the changes that we want would almost certainly need primary legislation, which, as we know, is like gold dust. The Departments may, by working together, be able to reach other agreements to the satisfaction of those concerned. I have enormous sympathy with them and a certain frustration that my Department cannot take action of the kind that we should like to.

I applaud my hon. Friend for raising the matters as she has. She has yet again brought before the House the difficulties of her constituents. I urge her and the policemen and women who are directly concerned to pursue, as far as possible, local solutions to their individual cases. However, I undertake to do everything in my power to find a solution to a difficult situation.

11.29 am

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

Police Tetra Masts (Sussex)

2.5 pm

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I am delighted to have at long last secured this debate on the operation of police Tetra masts in Sussex, having applied fairly consistently since November. I am also delighted to see many of my hon. Friends from West Sussex here today, whom I know will all try to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so as to raise their own constituency problems on the issue.

I am delighted to welcome my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring), who is something of an expert on the subject and will be speaking from the Conservative Front Bench. I am particularly delighted, although slightly bemused, to welcome also the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration. One always gets one's money's worth when he replies to a debate.

This subject has been raised in assorted Adjournment debates over the past few years. For the uninitiated, Tetra is terrestrial trunked radio—the emergency services communication system that is being rolled out across the United Kingdom. About 3,000 masts are commissioned and operational, with another 300 or so under construction. It is anticipated that the network will be completed shortly, with about 3,300 masts in total, and that it will go live at some stage in the next year. It has so far been costed at £2.9 billion, and as such it will be the biggest IT overhaul that the police have ever had to manage.

It is reasonable to suggest that the Tetra system should therefore have been subject to the most rigorous consultation with our constituents, whom the system aims to protect more efficiently and who will ultimately, of course, pay the bills. In the case of the masts in Sussex, especially in West Sussex, the consultation and the sensitivities to the concerns of local people have been deafening by their silence.

I do not pretend to be a scientist and I do not know whether the Tetra system is the best possible system available or whether it will do the job that the police need it to do to justify the £2.9 billion bill. People have said that an alternative system such as Tetrapol, which is used on the continent, would be more efficient and would require only 21 base stations in the whole south-east region whereas the Tetra system requires many more masts—in excess of 150 more than the whole Tetrapol system would require across the country.

As I say, I am not a scientist. I rely on the Home Office and the knowledge of the commissioning police authority to ensure that the right decisions are taken.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Regarding the technical spec, as this is obviously a national system, does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be helpful if the Home Office conducted a survey on the efficiency of the system? The police in my part of the world are far from happy with the coverage of Tetra and they have many of the same problems as with the previous system. They are rather disappointed, to put it mildly.

Tim Loughton: I certainly welcome the extension of the debate to the wilds of Gloucestershire. The hon. Gentleman's contribution, with which I wholeheartedly agree, is welcome. The problem is that we do not have the definitive information that we are entitled to so as to make informed decisions on behalf of our constituents, and neither do they. A study of the sort that he mentions has not been forthcoming, and certainly not in such a form that we can respond to with value judgments.

I do not know whether the emissions from the masts or the handsets pose any threat to health. Is this really not a pulsed system, as some have claimed, and what would it mean for health if it were? I am not particularly reassured when supposed experts admit that they could not guarantee the safety of the system and that it would be at least five to six years into operation before we had sufficient evidence to make a proper judgment. Experts are seeking additional funding of some £300,000 from the Government to conduct research on the likely effect of Tetra on children, some of the most vulnerable people in our communities.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): To extend the debate to Wales, does the hon. Gentleman accept that a key concern among constituents in Montgomeryshire—I imagine that the same is true of his constituents—is the unknown variable of health? As he said, the cost of the project comes to almost £3 billion, so would it not have been reasonable to expect exacting and meticulous research to have been conducted before the Tetra mast system was set up?

Tim Loughton: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point, as the debate travels ever further westwards, although I hope that, in terms of substance, it will not go west. I was in his constituency a little while ago, and certain people expressed to me the fears that he outlines. Interestingly, I saw more masts than police officers in his constituency.

To bring the debate back to the south coast, I see that the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Lepper) wants to intervene.

Mr. David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman mentioned health concerns. Five years ago, the Stewart report dealt with health issues related to mobile phone masts generally. Given the advances in technology, does the hon. Gentleman agree with the sentiments expressed in an early-day motion that is on the Order Paper? Among other things, it suggests that it is perhaps time for the Government to commission a reconvened Stewart inquiry or something similar to consider the health issues in the light of those technological changes over the past five years.

Tim Loughton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that contribution. He, too, makes a valid point: the Stewart report was indeed produced some years ago and it suggested adopting the precautionary principle, although it dealt with conventional mobile phone masts and certainly did not concentrate on Tetra masts, which are the subject of the debate. As I shall discuss in a moment, there is a plethora of different supposed studies, which may or may not have been commissioned by the Government. They are confusing, conflicting and, in any case, incomplete. We need a definitive study to reassure our constituents and to give them back the confidence to believe that the issue is being properly considered and that conclusions will be acted on. The hon. Gentleman's point is therefore absolutely right.

I am concerned when I hear that residents in several parts of Wales, although not necessarily in Montgomeryshire, are being asked to keep health diaries and fill in questionnaires about the perceived effect of mast transmissions on their health. I am concerned when certain local authorities are worried enough to use local council tax payers' money to commission local studies on the possible dangers of masts.

I am also concerned when I hear that Birmingham city council is particularly worried about the proliferation of Tetra masts and is, quite rightly, considering hardening its policy on the siting of masts. I am concerned when I read of surveys commissioned by police constabularies whose work forces use Tetra and which are raising cases of illness among users. Again, we do not get the definitive link between the radios, the masts and the work force, but if there is sufficient concern to warrant these studies there may be some basis to that concern.

All that is partly anecdotal and third hand, but when I see the results of a survey carried out in my constituency by residents living within 250 m of an operating Tetra mast, I tend to take a rather closer interest and become more anxious. Out of a sample of 448 people surveyed by residents since a mast was switched on in a residential area, 58.5 per cent. responded that they had recorded symptoms ranging from sleep disorders to headaches and nausea, all of which were contemporaneous with the operation of the mast. Of those people, 40 per cent. identified with having sleep disorders, 38 per cent. with having headaches and 16 per cent. with having rashes or itchy skin. We also have anecdotal evidence of pharmacies in areas affected by masts increasing their sales of painkillers and other remedies associated with some symptoms that I have mentioned.

I remain very concerned when questions posed to the Department of Health simply elicit references to the advice in the Stewart report, which is several years old. We are told that we have nothing to worry about, but when we get advice from the Home Office in response to parliamentary questions, it is rather inconclusive. Any research has barely started. A response from the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), said that

"Imperial College is carrying out a long-term health monitoring study of police users of Airwave" and that the

"Universities of Birmingham and Manchester are looking at patterns of use of Airwave among police users."

The reply also mentions work under way on the specific absorption rate in vehicles and states that, in addition, the Home Office is

"funding research on TETRA as an adjunct to the Mobile Telecommunications and Health Research ... programme."—[Official Report, 8 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 649W.]

Those studies are all under way. They are not finished studies that have produced results that can be given as reassurance or to raise worries. They are all ongoing.

Despite that, the system is up and running in many parts of the country. In the mean time, in my constituency and other hon. Members' constituencies, the masts continue to operate. Appeals to the mast operators to find alternative, more suitable locations go unheeded. My appeals to Sussex police authority to intervene on behalf of the Sussex council tax payers who fund them also go completely unheeded.

[Tim Loughton]

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): With respect to the health issues that my hon. Friend spoke about a moment ago, is it not particularly invidious that although local authorities are told by the Minister that health considerations may be material in determining planning consent applications, attempts to rely on such considerations are overturned on appeal, and that it turns out that the environmental concerns relate to aesthetics only, rather than to the health considerations involved in erecting a Tetra mast?

Tim Loughton: My hon. Friend makes some good points. I am sure that, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will elaborate on them, particularly mast sites in his constituency. I have come across just those problems, which have received very inadequate responses.

I have at least four Tetra masts in my constituency. I say "at least" because I am not entirely sure. The mast companies are not very forthcoming on the location of all the sites. I do not at this stage challenge Tetra's effectiveness as a system, because I do not know and am not qualified to know, but I am challenging the way that those responsible site the masts, oblivious to the concerns of local people.

A mast that is causing much fuss in my constituency has been put in one of the most densely populated parts of Worthing—a town of more than 100,000 people—on the gantry of floodlights at a football stadium, surrounded by houses on all four sides and with many young families and schools close by. The first that most residents knew of it was when engineers from O2 Airwave, which is responsible for installing the masts, began to erect a new mast aerial on a gantry that had been used for conventional mobile phones since 1989 under an agreement with the football club.

The football club itself was unaware of the implications. The president of the club, Morty Hollis, who is a pillar of the local community and always keen that the football stadium should be a good neighbour of the residents nearby, is horrified at the concerns that the mast has created among his neighbours and customers. However, he is tied into an agreement that was signed many years ago and would be subject to financial penalties if he were to reject the Tetra mast.

Planning permission was not applied for on the basis that, technically, the mast came within the 15 m exemptions. It was subsequently pointed out that it breached the 15 m limit, but, rather than reassess the site, O2 has simply reconfigured it to make the antenna integral to the supporting pole, so that, on technicalities, it comes back within the exemptions. That is a fairly commonplace solution to the problem of having to do something about such a matter.

Residents are understandably worried and they have sought help from councillors and from me. In particular, the ward councillor, Kenny Brady, was very supportive. When the mast was turned on to begin the testing period, many people simultaneously reported headaches and sleeplessness, which led to the survey that I mentioned. Later, when the mast was rendered non-operational after sabotage, people noticed an improvement—contemporaneous with when it was not on.

The most tangible effect of the mast emissions, however, has been the chaos that it has brought to TV signals on televisions within a quite wide radius that rely on conventional aerials. The effect is not uniform because many houses have cable, and it does not affect those, so one cannot say that a whole street suddenly lost ITV, for example. Residents complained to O2, which simply said that under Ofcom rules it is not responsible, even though it has admitted how its masts directly dilute the TV signals on some older receivers and are therefore causing havoc with the signals.

The only advice that O2 has offered to residents so affected is to call in a local professional TV repair firm to fit a new booster, which often costs as much as £150. It has not offered any compensation to people who have been watching their televisions problem free for many years, since before Tetra was even invented. Clearly, the television effect has made people more aware of the power and presence of mast emissions, but that cannot account for the simultaneous health implications.

Mr. Drew: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tim Loughton: In a moment. Is it fair that people should not be compensated for the loss of such amenities as a direct result of the masts? We sought legal advice from West Sussex county council, which has been supportive in this matter and which said that there are grounds for an action against the police authority or the O2 operators because those people have clearly suffered a loss of amenities. I shall give way again to Gloucestershire.

Mr. Drew: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way, and I might bring good news. There was a similar set of events in my neck of the woods and we were able to get compensation. Airwave kindly informed those people who had called in the friendly TV repairman that the only way to get compensation was through the office of their local MP, so I was pleased to receive 50 to 60 requests for compensation, which I told Airwave it could pay. Eventually, it paid the compensation, so the hon. Gentleman might want to follow that up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. I suspect that I am the only person here who is technically qualified to intervene on that point, but I cannot, which is rather frustrating.

Tim Loughton: Perhaps we can have a chat afterwards, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You could write to my constituents, passing on the information that the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) mentioned, so that I will not have to receive 50 or 60 such letters asking for my help. Certainly, we have so far singularly failed to get any gesture of good will, let alone financial compensation, from O2 in that respect.

Over a year ago, I met several local residents and summoned O2 Airwave to a small meeting, to which it was reluctant to come, as it is reluctant to attend any public meeting. Eventually, its representatives attended a meeting with a small group of residents and some planning officers from Worthing district council. The planning department was helpful, suggesting at least seven possible alternative sites in Worthing that would be far less harmful, given their distance from residential areas.

Mr. Lepper: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tim Loughton: One moment; I must make a bit of progress.

The officers even offered to drive the O2 representatives around the area to point out other possible sites. I suggested that instead of having one mast in the middle of a residential area, we might have two masts on the edge of town to achieve the same coverage with masts well away from houses. We tried to be helpful, practical and constructive. Back to Brighton, Pavilion.

Mr. Lepper: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way and for returning to Sussex. Will he comment on my proposal to the Highways Agency some years ago that it might wish to co-operate with mobile phone companies in considering locations within its remit away from built-up areas of the kind we are discussing? There might be a great deal of scope in such a proposal.

Tim Loughton: That is another possibility, but it should be up to local planning departments, working with local councillors in such a way that they are answerable to local people, to decide where they would be most comfortable with these things if they had to have them. Everybody wants to be able to use a mobile phone and wants the police and other emergency services to have the best radio system with which to protect them, but that does not mean that we have to have these masts being plonked wherever the mobile phone companies dictate on the ground of efficiency of the system rather than consideration of the fact that people, including young children and the elderly, live in those areas.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Tim Loughton: I shall give way to Worthing, West.

Peter Bottomley: I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate and on how he is introducing it. Does he agree that if it were possible to reassure people on health grounds, mobile operators could then have a more open consultation with local community groups and achieve the best environmental solution?

Tim Loughton: The problem is that people do not know what to believe. When masts are sited in what I can only describe as a surreptitious way, or, in the case of the mast in Worthing, without anyone knowing, and with minimal consultation and a dismal public relations offensive—a company effort to win hearts and minds—people get suspicious and expect the worst. I will come to that if I get the opportunity, as we have undertaken a tour d'horizon around the south coast, Gloucestershire and Wales.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to tell the House that the Tetra system was piloted in my area by Northumbria police.

Tim Loughton: Thank you very much, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That is a greater contribution than any other Deputy Speaker has made during debates in which I have participated, but it is all good information.

When I made my suggestions to O2, it went through the motions of having a half-hearted look at other potential sites. It told me that only one site would fit the criteria, knowing full well that it was not available. It was right in the middle of town anyway, on top of the building housing the Environment Agency, whose staff are the last people who would have such a mast on their building.

O2 agreed to go through the motions on the face of it, but it turns out that that was all for appearances and its interest soon fizzled out. It would cost several hundred thousand pounds to resite those masts; of course, this company wants to maximise its profits. I do not dispute that, but should it not be more sensitive to the concerns of the local people paying the bills—the taxpayers? This is a £2.9 billion contract: surely within its profit margin there is leeway for resiting some masts or putting in additional ones to compensate for lower coverage.

If O2 is challenged and a planning authority takes it to court or tries to take enforcement action so the matter ends up in a court case, it will use expensive lawyers to overturn cases brought by private individuals or local authorities. Those authorities are obviously hamstrung by having to make difficult decisions as to whether they should risk a great deal of local council tax payers' money to seek expensive legal counsel while being accountable to those council tax payers.

O2 Airwave has shown complete disregard for the concerns of local people. It did not consult them, it kept the mast sites quiet and it clearly had no serious intention to consider alternative sites. It has shown no concern for the damage caused to TV signals or any health implications, and it is one of the few mobile phone companies that has not signed up to the 10 commitments. It is rather good at producing a lot of reassuring leaflets with glossy pictures, but those leaflets do not convince my constituents.

People have raised problems about the effect of mast transmissions on digital cordless phones, lawnmowers, computers, police speed cameras and even pacemakers, but the Department of Health has declined to refer queries regarding pacemakers to the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency. That might sound fanciful, but in the absence of a serious attempt by anyone in a position of authority to address health concerns, people will obviously suspect the worst.

We have had a number of very well-attended public meetings in Worthing. An action group has been formed, piloted by residents such as Tony Malone and Andy Davidson, who have worked tirelessly in this area. Residents are concerned about the effect on the value of their properties, and many are trying to move. That does not help the confidence of local communities.

[Tim Loughton]

Having failed with O2, I approached the Sussex police authority. After all, it is commissioning O2 Airwave to install Tetra masts. It may claim that it has been strong-armed by the Home Office so that we have a national system, but it will be carrying out the commissioning. It had been helpful in sending the police expert to meetings to explain how the system worked and what it was all about.

Sussex council tax payers have experienced big rises in the Sussex police precept in recent years, and we would expect the unelected police authority to be rather more responsive when there are concerns about the activity for which those taxes have been paid. However, I have been fobbed off with a lot of technical guff about how the whole system is safe. I was told that an equivalent system has been used for almost 100 years and no one has been harmed by it, and that everyone is talking nonsense and being a bunch of whingers with psychosomatic symptoms.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): Although unelected, is not Sussex police authority Conservative led? In fact, the majority of its members are elected Tory councillors.

Tim Loughton: There are Labour councillors on the authority and it has previously been led by Labour councillors, but I do not seek to make any political point in this debate and I am rather sorry that the hon. Gentleman has introduced that note.

If a police authority is as unresponsive as this one has been, it deserves a good kick up the proverbial from any of us, whatever party we represent and whatever the leadership of the police authority. That is why that authority should be rather more accountable to the people who pay the taxes and expect to be protected and treated with respect. This does not have anything to do with politics. I hope that point has been made loud and clear to the hon. Gentleman.

When I expressed my concerns to one of the senior policemen involved in this project in an exchange of e-mails, he replied:

"I think your point about O2 needing to look for an alternative site in Worthing is a good practical suggestion in relation to Worthing".

He also said that I had his assurance that he would do all that he believed possible to avoid such a situation in Worthing, or elsewhere for that matter. A fat lot of good that was. All the authority has done subsequently is accuse the detractors of the system of not wanting to install a system that will adequately protect our constituents. It claims that it has no power over O2 Airwave. It promised to have a look at the controversial site in particular, but absolutely nothing has happened.

All the undertakings from the police authority have proved worthless. Its complete complacency towards the local residents it aims to protect has been appalling. Despite the representations, Tetra was not even mentioned in the last police authority minutes of 10 February. Its PR has been lamentable. I have to say that this situation makes a good case for elected police authority members who can be made more accountable if they show such complacency. It is a shame, because Sussex police authority has done many good things up to now, under whatever political leadership it might have been at the time. However, in the case of Tetra masts in Sussex, it has failed, and failed badly.

Residents in the area of that mast really are desperate. They have just sent out a letter from the campaigning action group, after all its hard work, showing their frustration. They issued a plea to people in a position of responsibility to help to address their concerns. I will quote a couple of paragraphs from the letter:

"Cynics may say that those reporting ill-effects are hypochondriacs; subject to autosuggestion or just mistaken. This mast is right in the midst of one of the most densely populated areas of Worthing. Most of the homes in the surrounding areas are not the 'socially-deprived' classes—they are established family homes—young working couples raising families; mature couples still living in the homes where they brought up their children; professional, skilled and retired people. They are honest-to-goodness, down to earth, 'Middle England' and they certainly aren't fanatics, activists or extremists. Looking at this dispassionately, of the 400-plus local people who took the trouble to respond to the survey—can you honestly believe that all of them have imagined—or are lying about—their (and their children's) headaches; nausea; rashes; nose-bleeds; sleep problems etc.? . . .

Someone—somewhere—must take responsibility for any ill-effects that Tetra (and of course other) masts may, in future, be proved to have caused. We have yet to find anyone so convinced of the safety of these masts that they will stand up and say 'Yes—I am totally confident that these masts are harmless and I can be held accountable if proved wrong'. Everyone approached on the subject has very quickly played 'pass the parcel'. That doesn't inspire confidence does it?"

I wholeheartedly identify with the sentiments of that letter. I am completely exasperated and feel that in some way I have let my constituents down because those masts still operate as they were intended to operate, in the places they were put, without any changes whatever. Yet again the wishes of local people and local councils are being ignored, bulldozed and treated with contempt by a Department—the Home Office—and by a multinational big business, O2 Airwave, which stands to make millions from the contract, as well as by a police authority that seems to have forgotten that its role is to protect local people and that a good start in that endeavour is usually to listen and respond to those people first.

As I said, I am not a scientist, nor do I have resources available to me in the form of Government medical advisers, but I know that many of my constituents and those of other hon. Members are very unhappy. Without being against the whole project, there are serious questions that still need and deserve to be answered.

The Government, or the local authorities responsible, need to investigate the possible cumulative effect of multiple masts. The mast in question is one of five mobile masts on that football stadium. There are four conventional masts, which are being upgraded for 3G, and a Tetra mast. There is a school of thought that suggests that the cumulative effect of so many masts in a tight, confined area, topped up with Tetra rays, might have a different effect from what one might expect from a single mast placed anywhere else.

That is a legitimate line of questioning, so I raised it with the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson). I asked her what research has been "commissioned on the cumulative effects of multiple mobile phone/Tetra masts on the health of people living nearby."

This is the response:

"The mobile telecommunications and health research programme supports about 30 studies of the potential effects of mobile phone telecommunications. Many of these are generic and accordingly relevant to TETRA. Some studies include a specific examination of the effects of TETRA. The programme is described on the web site".—[Official Report, 13 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 951W]

Blah, blah, blah—so it continues. There is not a single attempt in a great long paragraph even remotely to address the question of the cumulative effects of various phone masts, although that is a question that needs to be answered.

Another question involves the feasibility of having two masts on the edge of town, rather than one in the middle of a densely populated part of town. Those questions need to be answered, but O2 has not answered them. How closely are guidelines to prevent masts from being built close to schools, on top of police stations or close to hospitals being followed? What, in practice, does the precautionary approach mean for the siting of masts?

Mr. Lepper: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tim Loughton: I will do so for the last time, as I am almost finished.

Mr. Lepper: Has the hon. Gentleman's local authority taken the same view as mine, Brighton and Hove city council? If the local authority owns the premises on which the mast is to be erected, there are situations in which, rather than using the planning regime, landlord consent could be a useful tool in safeguarding the interests of local residents. Is his local authority pursuing that approach?

Tim Loughton: The hon. Gentleman may know that a number of larger landowners in the county of West Sussex have stated categorically that they will not allow masts on their property. I applaud those landowners for having taken that decision, which helps. However, they do not account for 100 per cent. of the county, no matter how much he and his party claim that the assets of rural England are in the hands of a few nobs.

Last week, I was delighted that the strategic environment and public protection committee of West Sussex county council, under the chairmanship of Councillor Louise Goldsmith, organised a public committee hearing on the issue of Tetra. A meeting was held in my constituency. The committee heard submissions from police, technical experts, local residents and anti-mast campaigners, which shows that West Sussex is taking the problems seriously. As I said, it has been supportive with regard to the concerns of West Sussex Conservative Members, many of whom are present. That committee is not going to let the situation go and will take the matter forward. Ultimately, of course, its powers are limited, except in the case of land that it owns, which relates to the point made by the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Lepper).

This matter has been handled exceedingly badly. It raises the need for an overhaul of our planning laws in respect of how masts get, or rather do not get, permission before they are sited. I am delighted that the policy of my party, which will, I am sure, be restated from the Front Bench, is to give far more powers back to local people and locally elected representatives to make decisions based on what is sustainable for local people. Such matters make people even more cynical about the ability and preparedness of people in authority to address their fears.

I hope that the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration will give a steer that the Government share my concerns about the lack of confidence that my constituents understandably feel. I also hope that he and his Government will do everything they can to encourage the police authorities that commission masts and the companies that install them to take more account of the local sensitivities of local people, whose confidence has understandably been completely undermined by a system that should be there to protect the public, not to engender fear among them, as it has in my constituency and the constituencies of many other Members.

2.40 pm

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): My contribution will be very brief, because I appreciate that I did not give notice beforehand. I just want to make one or two comments from the eastern end of the county.

It is important that we do not take a Luddite view of an important development in the protection of the citizen and the solving of crime. I want to explain the position from Hastings. The Tetra system came into effect in the Rother area of my constituency only a couple of weeks ago. When speaking to the chief inspector, I was told that the effect has been phenomenal. Whereas in the past, areas of the county were unable to receive any radio contact, the new system is making it possible for officers to be in touch and they can more ably do the job for which they are employed.

I would not go so far as to say that this debate masks the success Sussex police have had recently, but it is worth putting on record that in Hastings crime was down 10 per cent. last year and is also down 10 per cent. this year. That is not the issue this afternoon, however, save to say that these technological advances will help that effort all the more.

I do not discount entirely comments made by hon. Members who have received representations from their constituents; however, I have not received a single representation from my constituents about masts in the Rother area. In the past, I have received representations about mobile phone masts, but in so far as this particular enterprise is concerned, no representations whatever.

Peter Bottomley: Does the hon. Gentleman know where the masts are sited? Would he like to tell us now, so that it can be reported in his local press? Then people might know to whom they should write if they have a problem.

Mr. Foster: I appreciate that the masts are sited across the Rother area, but as to the precise spots, as no one has contacted me, obviously I do not know. Why would I? People are fast to contact their very available and accessible Members of Parliament if they have a problem, but that is not the case; the case is that the police say that the system is essential and must not be compromised as a result of certain comments. If unsafe systems can be resolved, we must try to resolve them. However, that is more down to local authorities.

[Mr. Foster]

The suggestion that the Home Office is the villain of the pact is wholly inappropriate. The people who made the contract were the Sussex police authority. The Sussex police authority—I do not apologise for saying this again—is Tory-led. Perhaps people in West Sussex, who nominate a goodly number of the members of that authority, should exercise a right of recall if they feel that those they have placed in that position, while generally doing a good job, have made a serious error in the case under discussion. That is not the position as I understand it from the East Sussex end. I know of no problems at my end of the county, so they may just be peculiar to West Sussex.

Tim Loughton: The hon. Gentleman again raises a political point. Perhaps he could tell us what the Sussex police authority would have done if it were Labour led, or what any Labour members of Sussex police authority have called for but had overruled because they were outvoted on the authority. Does he know?

Mr. Foster: Of course I do not know the detail, because it is unimportant. Democracy is about who is in charge, and we know who is in charge on the Sussex police authority. It is Tory led, with a Tory chairman, and if there were a Labour chair and a Labour authority it would be an authority over which I suspect I would have some influence. The hon. Gentleman has less interest in influencing his own party than I would hope to have with mine.

The important point is that the system is working, making it possible for crime to fall in Sussex, as it has done for the past few years and will continue to do. We must not in any way impede the tools that allow the Sussex constabulary to do the job for which it is paid.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the right hon. Gentleman—that is a clue—it seems that I shall have to invoke Mr. Speaker's ruling on winding-up speeches. The debate is local to Sussex, so it is therefore important that all Sussex Members get a fair kick at the ball. It looks like speeches of five, five and 10 minutes. I call Mr. Maude.

2.45 pm

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham) (Con): I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I can be brief. It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster), and I make an impassioned plea to his constituents: I hope that many of them will write to him. When his local paper picks up on what he said today, I am sure that his postbag will be full. I wish him well in dealing with it.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) on securing the debate; it is a tribute to his persistence. His constituents have borne the brunt of the rolling out of Tetra masts in West Sussex, which started in the south and is gradually moving northwards. The first two masts being sited in my constituency at Warninglid and Colgate are causing concern, although not a huge amount as they are not in built-up urban areas. My hon. Friend dealt eloquently with the health concerns that certainly exist but which have not been addressed definitively by the Government or any serious authority. It is inevitable that concerns remain, and the public are entitled to be anxious until their concerns are properly addressed; but I see no sign of that yet.

My concern is principally about the planning process that applies to Tetra masts and more broadly to commercial mobile telephone masts. None of us wants to stand in the way of progress. We all have an interest in good emergency services and good emergency communications. We should recognise that they are in our interests and in the interests of all our constituents. Indeed, pretty much all hon. Members have an interest in good mobile telephone communication. We use mobile phones a lot, and we complain bitterly if we do not get a good signal; but we also complain bitterly if mobile phone masts go up where we do not want them.

The planning process is not at all transparent. It does not allow a proper local debate, nor does it give people the sense that, through their elected representatives, such things can be controlled and their concerns addressed. That is one reason for the growing alienation between the governed and those who govern. People have the sense that although they can elect whichever local councillors they like, and whichever MPs they like, it makes no difference to what happens in connection with the things that affect them. That is important.

I appreciate that planning is not the Minister's responsibility, but he has been put up by the Government to answer the debate, and I hope that he will address that problem and show some understanding of the fact that the way in which the system works is causing grave concern. As I say, Tetra masts are merely emerging in my constituency, but the planning concerns that my constituents already have about commercial mobile phone masts are causing growing anxiety about Tetra masts.

One specific instance illustrates the point graphically. An application has been made by T-Mobile to erect a mobile phone mast; it is below 15 m, so ordinary planning permission is not required. It would be sited on a mini-roundabout at the junction between St. Leonard's road and Compton's lane in Horsham. That puts it within 300 yd of four schools—the Millais girls secondary school, the Forest boys secondary school, the Queen Elizabeth II special needs school and the Heron Way primary school. Three pre-school provisions are also to be found in the immediate neighbourhood. As a result, there will be 3,000 children within approximately 300 m of the mast, and some very much nearer.

The Stewart report states that

"caution should be exercised when planning these masts near schools or residential areas."

It seems that the advice is being ignored in that case. Many local people have expressed serious anxiety about the application. It now emerges that T-mobile has withdrawn it, but it is anticipated that it will submit another very slightly revised one shortly. Indeed, it may already have done so.

My constituents feel that the system that currently applies simply does not allow their concerns to be recognised and addressed. As the science advances and the research continues, it may well be established definitively that there is no health risk from immediate and close proximity to Tetra masts and ordinary mobile phone masts, but that has not yet been shown to be the case. The precautionary principle really should be applied but, more than that, my concern is that local people should have a greater sense of being in control of their destiny, and the system should be amended, as my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham set out very eloquently, to enable local councils to have the final say.

2.51 pm

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), who is right to raise the matter of public disaffection with the political process and the sense of powerlessness that people now feel under our democratic system. The way the Tetra masts have been rolled out, oblivious to local concerns, is a classic example of that.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) on securing this very important debate and on his excellent presentation of the issues that are of enormous concern to tens of thousands of people who live in the shadow of a Tetra mast. I share those concerns. One Tetra mast has already been erected on the site of existing masts at Littlehampton police station. It did not need planning permission, and so could be erected despite the fact that it is close to schools, a community hospital and a large number of residential properties.

The siting of the mast near a school, as other hon. Members have said, directly contravenes the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's code of best practice on mobile network development. There was no consultation with local people or with the local schools. When the mast was switched on, people began to notice problems with their health. They had nosebleeds, headaches, sleeplessness, confusion, loss of memory and skin problems.

A survey similar to the one carried out in Worthing, to which my hon. Friend referred, was conducted in the area around the mast in Littlehampton. Some 350 householders were consulted, 68 per cent. of whom reported health problems. There is also the prospect of a Tetra mast in the Southern Water compound at West park in Aldwick in my constituency. Planning permission was sought for the mast, as it exceeded 15 m, and I am pleased to say that it was refused by Arun district council. That is a totally unacceptable site for a Tetra mast. The compound is in a children's park, which is also frequently used for large-scale social events such as the annual Bognor carnival.

A mast has also been erected at the Bognor Regis golf club in Felpham. Again, no planning permission appears to have been necessary as a mast was already sited there; it was certainly not applied for. That was in June 2004. When the Tetra mast went up at Felpham, some 20 people in the immediate area reported similar health problems. Interestingly, the local campaigners against Tetra masts were sure that the mast had not been switched on, yet the local people insisted that they were suffering from health problems. It later turned out that the campaigners were wrong. The mast had been switched on and the local people were therefore correct. That directly answers the accusation that those people are simply suffering from psychosomatic problems or the power of suggestion.

Mr. Tyrie: It appears that there was a similar experience in Harting in my constituency with respect to the challenge as to whether or not the mast had been turned on. That spills over into concern in other areas, which is exactly what has happened in Sidlesham. An inquiry has been conducted into the mast there, and it is hoped that the inspector's decision will be announced on 7 March. Again, local people are extremely concerned about the health effects of that mast. Does my hon. Friend agree that the only rational way of dealing with this is to give power back to the local people and to allow local decisions to be taken about the siting of these masts? Does he also agree that that is the only reasonable way of reassuring the public about the health risk?

Mr. Gibb: My hon. Friend is right. The more reports there are of genuine health problems, the greater is the onus on us to ensure that research is undertaken into the effects on health. The Home Office and O2 claim that the symptoms are either psychosomatic or the normal occurrence of such ailments, and therefore unconnected with Tetra. I do not accept that. As my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham has also said, the power of the masts is such that it causes severe interference with television reception in the area around a mast. A special device has to be purchased—at the expense of the home owner, not of O2—to counter that reception interference.

Given the power necessary to cause that interference, and the fact that many people report significant health effects, why is there no Government-funded research into the health effects of living close to a Tetra mast? I understand that Professor Lawrie Challis, of the National Radiological Protection Board mobile telecommunication health research programme, confirmed in a recent meeting that no research is currently being carried out into the health effect of Tetra masts. There has been research into calcium exchanges in cells, but surely the best approach is not to look at each of those isolated areas of research, but to investigate the reported health problems experienced by people living close to Tetra masts, and to isolate those people from the effects of the masts or switch off the masts to see what effect that has on their health. Then research can be conducted to find out what causes particular symptoms.

There has been significant research into issues such as calcium exchanges in cells, and the effect of heat, but no real research has been conducted into the neurological effect of living near a Tetra mast and suffering prolonged exposure. In a written answer to me on 10 June 2004, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), claimed:

> "Defence Science and Technology Laboratory (Dstl) researchers have completed their work on calcium exchanges in cells—the main concern of the Stewart report. They found Tetra exposure had no effect".

[Mr. Gibb]

She went on to say:

"Work is continuing to see if exposure to Tetra can affect electrical activity in brain cells and to assess the effects of Tetra signals on cognitive performance. Quarterly reports are available".

My understanding—the Minister in the Chamber can correct me if I am wrong—is that the research has not been authorised and no funds have been released to finance it. In other words, no research is being carried out into the neurological effect of Tetra masts. I emphasise the word "masts". The Minister replied to other written questions by stating:

"The National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) has calculated specific absorption rates from Tetra handsets. Even in worst case situations, these were found to be well below international health and safety guidelines. In areas accessible to the public, signals from Tetra masts are very much weaker than those from handsets".

She concluded:

"The NRPB has not carried out any further work on specific absorption rates from Tetra masts".

On the same date, she said:

"The main Microwave Consultants Limited expert currently working on specific absorption rates from Tetra equipment is Dr Philip Chadwick. The research does not include Tetra masts."

In another written answer, she told me:

"King's College London is already assessing the effects of GSM mobile phone handsets on cognitive performance and stress levels. It will extend the study to Tetra handsets in 2005. No work is planned on Tetra base stations or masts."—[Official Report, 10 June 2004; Vol. 422, c. 511–30W.]

That is very wrong. There is genuine concern about the safety of the masts. People who live near them are reporting serious health effects as a consequence, and I believe their reports, yet no research has been conducted, or is being carried out, into their complaints or into the general neurological consequences of prolonged proximity to Tetra masts.

The real concern, which I hope the Minister will address, is the effects of resonances set up by magnetic radiation emanating from the masts. The burden seems to have been passed from the Government and O2 to an unfunded but competently managed group of protesters and local residents, led in my area by John O'Brien. Surely the onus should be on O2 and the Home Office to satisfy the public that the masts are safe. I hope that the Minister will give us a commitment to that effect this afternoon.

2.59 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): First, may I, like other right hon. and hon. Members, congratulate the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) on securing the debate? For the most part, his comments were measured. He presented his case as a series of questions, and that approach was taken up by other hon. Members—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman gets too far, I should point out that the Back-Bench contributions finished a bit earlier than I thought they would, so if the two Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen can square the time a bit, we can go to seven and a half minutes for each of their speeches and 15 minutes for the Minister's.

Mr. Carmichael: I am grateful to you for that advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although I may be able to give up some of my time so that the Minister can give us a slightly fuller reply to this wide-ranging debate.

The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham said that the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) comes from the wilds of Gloucestershire. If he thinks that Gloucestershire is wild, I am not sure what term he would apply to my constituency. None the less, it is interesting to have the opportunity to observe a debate whose subject is so far removed, geographically speaking, from my constituency. It is also interesting because there are so many themes to which I can relate as a constituency Member. I am thinking in particular of the point made most forcefully by the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), who said that, in so many different ways, and in so many different parts of the country, people feel that they do not have control over their own communities and destinies. That lies at the heart of this subject.

I should also place it on record that the duty of responding to this debate would normally have fallen to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker). I know how energetic he has been in pursuit of this subject, because I had to read his file to familiarise myself with the topic in preparation for the debate. He has been thorough—something for which he is widely known, and no doubt admired, in the House.

As the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham said, there is a need for a proper and comprehensive debate. Coming to the subject fairly new, it strikes me that although there has been a multiplicity of studies, there does not seem to have been an overarching look at the effect of masts, as the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) pointed out.

If I can wear my hat as vice-chairman of the all-party group on telecommunications for a second, the approach taken by O2 in dealing with communities has left something to be desired. Where there is lack of openness and candour, suspicion and concern will inevitably grow. No one who has contributed to the debate has in any way sought to exaggerate those concerns, and they are to be commended for that.

I commend to the Minister the thorough report on mobile phones and health produced by the National Radiological Protection Board at the start of the year. It made a number of recommendations, and I draw his attention to the first two. The first relates to communities' ability to gain access to all the up-to-date information about Tetra and mobile communication masts and phones. The second is that the planning process associated with the erection of mobile phone base stations and masts should be the subject of an independent review. The report called for particular attention to be given to how best to minimise the exposure of potentially vulnerable sub-groups, such as children, and for continuing research on the possible health effects of mobile phone technologies to be strongly supported. As other hon. Members have observed, some time has passed since the publication of the Stewart report and it would be a worthwhile exercise if the Government were to resurrect that or to revisit its findings.

The other concern that the NRPB report rightly highlighted was the role of Ofcom. We all know that Ofcom is fairly young, and it clearly still has a lot of proving to do. However, it is quite clear that Ofcom has been able to make available rather less information on such matters than is sufficient. The report also recommended that Tetra base stations should be audited in the same way as global system for mobile—GSM—base stations. Until more information becomes available, the board considers that it would be premature to rule out the possibility of health effects on users of Tetra-based equipment and believes that a precautionary approach should be adopted. I think that the Minister will find little in that with which he will be able to argue in principle. We know why the police want Tetra in a broader sense, but surely a proper balance has to be struck.

3.6 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) on setting out his case comprehensively and rationally. This subject is a matter of concern not only in Sussex but in many other parts of the country.

I should like, if I may—particularly as you have an understanding of the subject, Mr. Deputy Speaker—to relay my personal experience, because it echoes so powerfully the experience of hon. Members. I discovered that a Tetra mast had been erected on a block of flats in Newmarket in my constituency—90 per cent. of the town of Newmarket is in the county of Suffolk. There were protests and great concern that that had been done in a stealthy way.

As a result of the protests, I intervened and negotiated with the company that had erected the Tetra mast. I spoke at length with the Suffolk constabulary and there was a public meeting. We had agreed that the Tetra mast would be moved from the flats to the top of a hill—or what passes for a hill in East Anglia—just outside Newmarket, and I was confident that that had happened. One morning we all woke up to find that the Tetra mast had been moved, but to that part of Newmarket that is in Cambridgeshire. That was a disgraceful and dishonourable thing to do. I had words with the chief constable of Suffolk, who had no idea that that was happening. We then experienced the ritual with which we are all now so entirely familiar, as the local council challenged the move and lost on appeal, which happens virtually every single time because there is no protection in the law.

That occurrence was so disgraceful because the new Tetra mast was close to a school and to an area of high population concentration. The code of best practice of the operating companies is simply not worth the paper that it is written on. It includes, for example, consultation with the local Member of Parliament—some consultation. There is no effective planning control, and the behaviour of some of the operating companies has been a disgrace and has undermined public confidence.

Five years ago, Sir William Stewart reported on the question of the location of base stations and transmission masts. He talked about the precautionary principle, which we have heard a lot about this afternoon. However, I wonder whether hon. Members noticed that only weeks ago he called for the precautionary principle to be revisited for precisely the reasons that I am suggesting. It has not been applied in practice, because there is no effective planning control. This is a matter of public confidence.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) is absolutely correct; people are alienated by a process in which they feel they have no control whatever over something controversial that might have an impact on their health and on their lives, certainly from an aesthetic point of view at the very least. They feel alienated from the process and from local government, which is there to protect their interests. I say quite dispassionately to the Minister that that is exactly what is happening in practice, with all the attendant consequences.

I introduced a private Member's Bill to try to deal with the problem, but I regret that the Government did not accept it and it did not see the light of day. Let me say just this: the effects of the frequencies of the Tetra system are different from those of normal telecommunications masts because the pace of Tetra electrical impulses is such that they affect the brain and human bodies quite differently. That is of great concern to at least a minority of scientists.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) was absolutely right to talk about the health concerns. I do not know—none of us can know—whether the outbreaks of dizziness, nausea, and erratic behaviour, particularly in young children in schools close to Tetra masts, are part of some mass hysteria. As all these cancer clusters have developed for no apparent reason—they have been well documented in different parts of the country because they are in the beam of the greatest intensity—we must, as Members of Parliament, adopt the precautionary principle and be very careful.

Cannabis was considered to be completely harmless in the 1960s and 1970s, yet habitual cannabis smokers in California are now suffering from different forms of cancer much earlier than is usual because of the carcinogenic properties of cannabis. At the time, we did not know what the long-term effects of cannabis would be. I simply say, therefore, that we do not know what the health implications of Tetra masts are, but the evidence is of concern and we must respond to it.

The hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster) was absolutely correct to say that we want an efficacious communications service. Of course we do. We want it for our police and our ambulance services. In theory, Tetra involves a national digital mobile radio communications system that the emergency services find quite valuable. However, I have looked into the matter and discussed it at length, and must say to him that Tetra is based on 1950s and early 1990s technology that can no longer be described as the state of the art, as Airwave claims. It cannot, for example, send graphics, faxes, photos or video streams. It cannot access the police national computer, nor can it send or receive files or fingerprints. It cannot access the internet, and it is expensive. It will cost £3 billion to start up, and there will be 3,350 new base stations, including 87 in the county of Sussex.

[Mr. Richard Spring]

Following the reluctance of police forces to adopt Tetra, the Government agreed to fund its introduction with £500 million, to be shared among all police forces. We heard about the police precept. The cost above the £500 million must be met from the council tax. Of all the stealth taxes introduced by this Government, the one that has caused our constituents the most irritation and concern has been the soaring cost of the council tax. That plays a part in all this and, from that point of view, the situation is entirely unsatisfactory.

In trying to highlight the issue in a non-party political way, as I and many other hon. Members have tried to do, I have been astonished that the Government have not reacted in the way that would be appropriate for a Government in such circumstances, despite private conversations with Ministers and pressure from Labour Members. The fact is that the system, however efficacious, needs careful monitoring. The locations of sites need to be checked, and local people need local control over the local environment. If we do not proceed in that way we shall store up problems for the future.

My final point is party political. The Conservative party—others will share this view—now believes that masts should require full planning permission. We are an overcrowded and small island, which is densely populated in parts. We must protect our citizens from potential health difficulties and the environment in which we live, and give some sense of control to people who increasingly feel that they have less and less control over the things that are important to them in their day-to-day lives.

3.16 pm

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Desmond Browne): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring), even if he did, in his final comments, fail to resist the temptation to adopt a party political stance. However, in view of how the debate has been conducted, perhaps we can forgive him that slight lapse.

I congratulate the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) on securing the debate and on his tenacity and persistence in doing so. He has done the House a service this afternoon, and not only by providing an opportunity for a debate that, although limited geographically, has dealt with issues close to the heart of many constituencies and constituents. I have had my fair share of constituent correspondence on mobile phone masts, although not specifically on Tetra masts. I also congratulate the hon. Gentleman on how he set out his arguments. He was very fair.

The hon. Gentleman said that many questions need and deserve to be answered. He is right, and I shall endeavour in the time available to answer as many as I can. However, I assure all right hon. and hon. Members who have taken part in the debate that, despite the fact that this subject does not fall four-square in my area of Home Office ministerial responsibility, I shall pass on all the comments to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), who has an unavoidable commitment outside London today dating from long before the debate was fixed.

I shall, of course, also pass on comments to other Ministers in other Departments, where appropriate. However, I do not want to avoid the responsibility to answer the debate as comprehensively as I can in the time available.

Before I discuss some detail, I want to mention the fact that there is one area of dispute between me and the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham on this matter, which is the weight he attaches to the results of the survey conducted in his constituency. I am sure he will accept that although it may never have been intended as a scientific survey, there are concerns about how it was conducted, which would normally affect the view someone took on its conclusions. It would serve no purpose—it would be hypercritical—to list them all, although I have them available, but as a piece of scientific work the survey is significantly flawed. However, it may not be so flawed as a measure of the views of the hon. Gentleman's constituents. To the extent that it helps us to understand our responsibilities, collectively and individually, and my ministerial responsibilities to his constituents, it is valuable. It is far from being a scientific work, however, and there were serious flaws in how those who conducted it communicated with those from whom they wished to extract the information.

The hon. Gentleman laid out the background to the issue well. Although I want to say something about Airwave and the Tetra process, I do not propose to explain to the House what the issue involves, because it seems to me that everybody who is present and has contributed to the debate has a fair idea of what is going on in producing a modern communication system for the police. However, I repeat the view that my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster) shared with the House, which is that police officers are delighted with the new system. A significant number of them use it throughout the United Kingdom.

The increased coverage provided by Airwave means, importantly, that there are no more holes in the system to endanger the safety of police officers. The system's emergency button means that they can summon help quickly and the improved clarity of signals means that they can work more effectively, efficiently and safely than with previous communication systems.

I shall give three examples of improvements. One is the view of Sussex police, who have given positive feedback on clarity, quality, coverage and freedom from interference and eavesdropping—that is important—as well as the functionality of the new system. The hon. Member for West Suffolk criticised the system by implication, saying that it is by no means state of the art and listing a series of things he claims it cannot do. I do not remember exactly what those were, but I recognise in some of them functions that I have been specifically briefed the system can do—in particular, providing access to the police national computer.

I will ensure that that list is gone through and that the hon. Gentleman and other right hon. and hon. Members get a detailed response. I do not think that providing such a response at the moment would be the best use of my time.

Mr. Spring: I accept that the system is of value to our emergency services, but I simply note that it is not used in other parts of Europe, where people use a system that they feel is better. That system was not considered when Tetra was introduced in this country.

Mr. Browne: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, which leads me to the first question that the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham asked: why we are using the Tetra system and not Tetrapol, which may be the system that the hon. Member for West Suffolk is referring to? Tetrapol is, as I understand it, a French system that, if it were operated on a similar frequency band to Tetra, would require slightly fewer base stations and, consequently, slightly fewer masts. I have no expertise in the area and rely on advice. I am advised that the comparison is with a low frequency system that does not provide the same coverage or fill in the gaps in coverage that Airwave fills. I am advised also that Tetrapol would not meet the police's communication system requirements.

I have significant information about the extent to which Tetra is used throughout Europe and the rest of the world—it is used extensively—but it would not be the best use of my time to list the locations in which it is used or its geographical spread.

The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham asked why no research was done before implementation. The answer to that was partly given by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as you were able to tell the House that the system was piloted in your constituency. That is correct. It is fair to say that the issues of concern to which most hon. Members devoted their attention, outwith the issue of planning, were first raised in the Stewart report of 2000. The issue of planning is a function of the concern about health, as there would be nothing like the concern about planning if there were no underlying concern about health.

All short-term issues raised by that report have been addressed and no concerns have been found. As hon. Gentlemen suggested with their request for specific research, long-term research needs a user base and monitoring over many years so as to gather enough statistics to examine whether there are even any small effects.

Mr. Maude: I appreciate that my point is not the concern of the Minister's Department, but I hope he can comment on it. He says that the short-term issues in the Stewart report have been addressed. I quoted the part of the report that said that caution should be exercised when planning a commercial mobile phone mast in residential areas or close to schools, yet caution is not being exercised. That is one short-term concern expressed in the Stewart report that has simply not been addressed.

Mr. Browne: I do not dismiss the right hon. Gentleman's contribution to this debate. He expects me to treat it seriously, and I do. I listened carefully to the concern he expressed about the Littlehampton mast, but as I understand it that is a T-Mobile mast, which I do not think can be a Tetra mast. However, I understand that he used it as an example.

Mr. Spring: It was a planning example.

Mr. Browne: Well, I am not specifically instructed about every mast—Tetra or otherwise—that there may be in Sussex, but I undertake to respond to all hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on individual masts and on the concerns that they have raised. That is the best way to deal with those concerns.

I am specifically instructed that O2 follows the planning guidelines of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I cannot leave this debate without undertaking to address the concerns raised by hon. Gentlemen, whose accounts of events I trust, although those concerns contradict the information that I have. I can say that the ODPM will consider a revised planning process to include all masts, which is a step in the direction that hon. Gentlemen have encouraged. Currently, as we have heard, not all masts require planning. If they are new and above a certain height, however, they are required to go through the planning process.

With regard to the other suggestions about how the planning process ought to work, and whether the process ought to stop at the decision of the local authority, which appears to be the official Opposition's position on planning for mobile phone masts, I shall have to take further advice, consider the matter and respond to those who have contributed to the debate. However, I wonder whether that is precisely how the Opposition would operate were they ever faced with the responsibility of providing such a system. I wonder whether that is really what they would do: give up the opportunity for an appellate process in the planning system.

Mr. Spring: As it is only a matter of weeks before the Minister finds out exactly what will happen, may I say to him that the system would follow the same appeals process as any other planning element? I want to stress absolutely dispassionately that, at the moment, any attempt by a district council to stop or prevent the construction of a base station or transmission mast, or to have them removed, invariably fails, such is the weakness of the planning support structures for local councils. I want him to know that explicitly.

Mr. Browne: I thank the hon. Gentleman for reinforcing the point that he has already made.

Mr. Spring: I want the Minister to understand it.

Mr. Browne: I do understand it. With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I fully understand the point he made. I intend to consider it and draw it to the attention of the relevant ODPM Minister.

There are understandable public health concerns arising from the siting of mobile phone masts and the development of the network for mobile communication. The Government have responded in a perfectly appropriate way to the Stewart report. There was a second Stewart report at the end of last year, so when hon. Members call for a supplementary Stewart report, they should know that there already is one.

Mr. Spring: We said it should be revisited.

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman may have been referring to some comments that were made in the context of the publication of that second report. All the report's recommendations are being taken forward and the relevant research is being conducted. Hon. Members seem to have extensive knowledge of the nature of that research, but it is appropriate that I should set out exactly what the Government's position is. In March 2004, the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety updated all hon. Members by way of a letter on Tetra health and safety issues.

[Mr. Browne]

It is important to note that neither the Stewart report of May 2000 nor the follow-up reports of the National Radiological Protection Board in 2003 and 2005—the 2005 report being Sir William's second on the subject—nor the 2001 report of the NRPB's advisory group on non-ionising radiation concerning Tetra technology found any established evidence of any adverse effects on health from exposure to radio frequency emissions at levels within international guidelines. The Tetra system works within international guidelines.

The AGNIR report recommended eight areas for further research. The Government accepted those recommendations and have advanced them either as part of the mobile telecommunications and health research programme or in the Home Office research programme.

The comprehensive recommendations that have been referred to are further studies on the behaviour of calcium in tissues to determine the extent and significance of any effects that occur; further studies on the effects of amplitude modulation or pulsing; investigation of the possibility that modulated radio frequency fields might somehow increase the likelihood of epileptic seizures; investigation of possible mechanisms by which living cells might demodulate amplitude modulated RF fields; human volunteer studies, which is what hon. Members are calling for, to measure changes in cognitive performance; studies to examine working practices in conditions of exposure to RF radiation from Tetra systems; the inclusion of Tetra-based stations in Ofcom's audit of base stations; and further work on providing more information on exposure from hand portables, which are the part of the system that generates the greatest concern.

The Government contacted reputable, independent organisations to carry out that research, and I am concerned that hon. Members may have misunderstood exactly what has taken place since then. I shall spell it out carefully so that it is properly recorded. The Defence Scientific and Technological Laboratory has looked into the first three recommendations and the fifth. The Burden Neurological Institute, which is part of the MTHR programme, considered the fourth. King's college London and the university of Bradford, which is also part of the MTHR programme, considered the fifth. Imperial college London, the university of Birmingham and the university of Manchester looked at the sixth. The Radiocommunications Agency, which is now Ofcom, looked at the seventh, and Microwave Consultants Ltd. looked into the eighth.

Interim reports relating to all that work are available from the Home Office websites. Final reports are being peer reviewed for publication in the academic press and will be made available on the web as soon as they are available. Although peer review delays publication of the final report, it is an important procedure that gives credibility to the scientific process—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Time is up.

A21 (West Kent)

3.35 pm

Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): It is a great pleasure to have the opportunity to raise this fraught issue again. I am grateful to the Minister for giving up his time to respond to the debate. He has been generous with his time on debates on the A21 in the past, in which we have discussed the issue in some detail, and will be familiar with many of the points that I shall raise. I know that he will not want to read out the official script, but will want to respond directly to points raised by me and other hon. Members.

We may be privileged enough to have a visit from the Minister on 8 March, when the Lamberhurst bypass may open. If that is the case, and we would be delighted to see him, I hope that he will take the opportunity to drive down the A21 and experience the delays and difficulties involved. If he does so, I hope that he will manage to avoid the rush hour, otherwise he may arrive too late to cut the red ribbon.

The A21 is the main arterial strategic route from the M25 to Hastings, and provides the economic lifeline not only to my constituency of Tunbridge Wells, and to Tonbridge, but right down to Hastings, which we know to be an area of relative economic deprivation with comparatively high levels of unemployment. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster) is here today. Yet, as a result of a series of ad hoc initiatives over the past 30 years, instead of a strategic approach being taken to the road, there has been an hourglass effect: the road is dual carriageway, then a single-lane bottleneck followed by dual carriageway, then a single lane, then the new dual carriageway at Lamberhurst bypass, then a single lane right down to Hastings, which creates immense frustration to local people, delays at each bottleneck in each rush hour, and safety hazards.

The impact of the problem cannot be underestimated: it is the factor holding back economic development in our area and, more seriously, down to Hastings. That is illustrated by the following quotes. The superintendent of Kent police said:

"The Castle Hill section of the A21 is a nightmare. It adds at least 25 minutes to the journey into Tunbridge Wells. Police movement, despite the assistance of sirens, is inhibited by the current situation."

The managing director of AIM Plastics in Tunbridge Wells said:

"Companies like mine will very soon move away rather than waste our time in a daily unavoidable traffic jam."

It was, of course, the previous hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle, Mr. Charles Wardle, who famously said that

"the probable reason that Harold lost the battle of Hastings was that he was held up on the A21."—[Official Report, 11 February 1998; Vol. 325, c. 329.]

One can imagine the dismay felt by people in west Kent and Sussex in July 1997, when the Weald and Downland design, build, finance and operate scheme—the previous Government's plan to improve the A21—was binned and the contractors compensated to the tune of £4 million to £6 million, I believe, and it was announced that instead there would be the trunk roads review. Nevertheless, many local people were prepared to accept that the incoming Government were going to adopt a different approach and were heartened by the announcement by the then Minister for Transport, the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang), that the Government intended:

"to bring a fresh approach to the process of making decisions on the roads programme."—[Official Report, 28 July 1997; Vol. 299, c. 33W.]

People then looked forward to a fresh approach that would be not only environmentally sensitive, but strategic. What emerged, in reality, was a protracted series of consultations and reviews, endless local consultation and tactical prevarication, yet, even today, there is no strategic approach to the overall construction of the route, no deadlines, no serious commitments to a timetable and immense local concern and indecision.

The process began with the trunk roads review, then the "Access to Hastings" study, which recommended "on-line improvements" at Castle Hill and improvements south of Pembury. That study is particularly important because it involved consulting all the local people, and the subsequent report on it was the subject of consultation by all the relevant regional authorities, including the South East England regional assembly, which was almost unanimously in support of the recommendations for improvement. The process was exhaustive and consultative, and it received virtually unanimous approval.

At that point, the Government had all the information required to go ahead with proposals for strategic improvement throughout the route. Indeed, that appeared to be happening. The then Secretary of State for Transport announced shortly afterwards that work would probably start on the A21 at Castle Hill in 2006–07, and a further review would be undertaken to define the best route for improvement for the area south of Pembury. Hope burgeoned and we were all much encouraged. The Government appeared to have a logical strategic approach.

In July 2003, people from the Highways Agency arrived in Tonbridge and Tunbridge Wells and went round the public with computer simulations of the preferred route, showing what it would look like at Castle Hill. We were led to believe that the matter was in hand, the pubic inquiry would ensue and so on. Late in 2004, after much delay and local debate, a preferred route was also defined for the route from Kippings Cross to Lamberhurst, south of Pembury. The Minister and I had discussions on the matter, the Government formed their conclusions with regard to the preferred route, and it was announced to the public. Whether we liked it or not, that was the route that was taken, and it appeared that everything was likely to go ahead.

Ever since then, we have seen slippage and inaction, and I want to illustrate that with some quotes. The first is from the Highways Agency newsletter of November 2002, which said that "it is expected that construction of the Castle Hill scheme could commence in 2005/6."

Seven months later, in July 2003, the Minister wrote to me—he might remember this—saying:

"The Highways Agency are looking to publish highways orders in 2004"—

last year—

"and hope to start work in 2005/6 with the road opened in 2007/8."

[Mr. Archie Norman]

That was the commitment from the Minister himself. Never have we had a word of apology or explanation for any subsequent delay. In fact, no such orders were published in 2004 and no public inquiry has taken place or is scheduled. Latterly, we have had no word from Ministers and no explanation to hon. Members. Instead, a press release has slipped out from the Highways Agency. It says:

"While both the A21 Tonbridge to Pembury Dualling and A21 Kippings Cross to Lamberhurst Improvement schemes remain in the Government's programme, for schemes of regional importance such as these, priorities and decisions will take into account advice from the regional planning body, the South East Regional Assembly.

The detail of how this will work is still under consideration, but we expect to know more early in 2006."

By which time, of course, the road was meant to be under construction. The press release continues:

"This means that construction ... will not start before the financial year 2008/9 at the earliest."

So we have another consultation, with bodies that have already been consulted and which expressed unanimous approval, and no explanation from the Minister, despite the fact that that is in direct contradiction to his statements in previous letters. Furthermore, we do not even know exactly how the consultation will take place, who will be consulted or how it will work. I have contacted the Highways Agency and am told that it is still waiting to hear from Ministers exactly what form the consultation will take.

There can be little wonder, therefore, that local people regard the process with some cynicism. We started by hearing that we would have a fresh approach to roads decision making; we embarked wholeheartedly on another series of consultations, despite the fact that there had been a public inquiry on the whole thing in 1991 and all the issues had been thrashed through before; we involved the local regional authorities, Kent county council and other such bodies; everybody was in support and the Minister said that we were going ahead. It appeared that we had a strategic approach, as we were dealing with not just Castle Hill but the area south of Pembury—we were going to tackle the whole route. It all looked very encouraging, but it just slipped and slipped, and, even today, there is no commitment on the time scale. We do not even know how further consultation will take place.

Local people may be forgiven for thinking that all of that is a shallow excuse for deferring and spreading out public expenditure. The Minister may want to tell me whether that has anything to do with it. Equally, they may wonder whether the intentions of the Government in respect of this part of west Kent and Sussex were ever sincere. There is widespread cynicism about the Government's intentions. There has always been a belief—colleagues of mine have expressed it—that there never was a sincere intention to do the work. I do not believe that that is true. I believe that the Minister will be as good as his word, but he should recognise that people are now looking for a strategic statement of intent and a commitment on the time scale. We want to know what the consultation is for and whether we can avoid further delay. He will recognise that it will serve very little value. Once the consultation has taken place, when is work likely to start? Is there a coherent time scale, or will the work at Castle Hill dribble on for ever? When will work start south of Pembury? Finally, what process will be undertaken for the preferred route for the area south of Flimwell that was recently announced? That is now going out to consultation.

This is not just a question of convenience or even of economic development, as important as that may be, but of safety. The road is one of the 100 most dangerous roads in Britain. There have been 300 accidents on the Castle Hill stretch in the past five years, four of them fatal. On the Flimwell stretch—a very short stretch of road—there have been 116 accidents in the past four years, seven of them fatal. The longer we delay, the more fatal accidents there will be, the more the future economic development of Hastings and other locations along the route will be held back and the more local people will wonder whether the Government have a coherent roads and transport strategy at all.

3.47 pm

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) for giving his consent for me to contribute to this debate. He has announced his retirement from the House at the next election, and no one could have done more than he has during his time in the House to promote improvements on the A21. I know that his constituents are grateful for his consistent Herculean efforts.

I shall speak about the section of the A21 between Tonbridge and Pembury, which is the part that affects my constituency. The lack of dualling on that section has the most baleful economic consequences for the whole of the business life of the Tonbridge, Southborough and Tunbridge Wells area. It has serious implications for ambulances and the police, and it is a continuous source of acute frustration for any number of motorists who find themselves in a jam between Tonbridge and Pembury at any hour of the day, but particularly during the rush hour. It is a very serious impediment to all those who live in the area.

The history of the A21 is simple. A perfectly good scheme was ready in 1997, having gone through the planning and public inquiry processes. The funding was in place and the scheme was about to go ahead, but since 1997 there have been eight wasted years. A perfectly good scheme was unnecessarily scrapped. The new one included access to Hastings, but this is about access to Tonbridge, Tunbridge Wells and Southborough. Huge amounts of money were wasted on consultancy fees and further inquiries. As of today, we are no further forward and, as we look ahead, we find that there is no construction date and that the whole scheme has now become enveloped in the regional bureaucracy beloved of the present Government.

I say this with great regret, but I have to say it straight to the Minister: the handling of this scheme by the Government has been characteristic of so much of their activity. It has been marked by a huge wastage of public money—taxpayers' money—by ever greater layers of bureaucracy, and by no delivery of goods in the end. Will he set a date today for the start of the construction of the scheme, particularly the dualling of the A21 between Tonbridge and Pembury?

3.51 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I congratulate the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) on securing the debate. He and I have something in common: after the next election, neither of us will be here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. He is not the only one.

Mr. Jamieson: I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There are more than two of us who will not be here after the next election. However, that will be the choice not of the electorate, but of those who could be standing for the seat.

I was pleased to hear the contribution from the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) and I am pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster), who has been campaigning on the issues all the way along the road for a considerable time. The road is much busier than it was. There is a lot of economic activity around the country, but particularly in the south-east. My hon. Friend recognises that the A21 is vital to his constituency and to economic development in that area.

There are essentially four schemes: Tonbridge to Pembury, Kippings Cross to Lamberhurst, the Lamberhurst bypass, and the Flimwell to Robertsbridge improvements. Before 1997, the only schemes that had been given any priority were the Tonbridge to Pembury scheme and the Lamberhurst bypass. The Kippings Cross to Lamberhurst scheme had no long-term commitment in 1996. There was no funding; there were just some plans. Then there is the Flimwell to Robertsbridge scheme. In fact, many of the improvements—considerable though they were and despite being valuable to many of the communities on that road—were abandoned in 1996 with no view to reinstating them. It is important that we put the debate in context, because we are doing a great deal, as I shall outline.

The debate comes at an opportune time because next Wednesday, 9 March, we will see the opening of the Lamberhurst bypass. Parliamentary business permitting, I hope to be there to cut the tape and see the traffic go through. However, I believe that some parliamentary business may keep a number of us here, rather than allowing us to be elsewhere. The opening of the bypass follows on from my announcement on 17 February this year of the preferred route for the improvement of the Flimwell to Robertsbridge section of the A21. That was the scheme that was abandoned in 1996. Those schemes, along with the entry of two other A21 schemes into the Government's targeted programme of improvements—the Tonbridge to Pembury dualling in July 2003 and the Kippings Cross to Lamberhurst improvement in May 2004—demonstrate the Government's commitment to the upgrading of the A21, not only in Kent, but through East Sussex.

After less than two years of construction, the Lamberhurst bypass will open next week, at a cost of £19 million. Although we had hoped to have an early opening of the bypass last autumn, it is now back on target and will be opened next week. This much-needed bypass will bring relief to the village of Lamberhurst. The sinuous alignment of the A21 there does not comply with current design and operational requirements, and there are steep gradients on either side of the village. As a result, any incident or routine maintenance on the existing road quickly leads to delay and congestion. The volume of traffic now passing through the village causes community severance and a decrease in air quality, particularly at peak times and during the summer months. On completion, the bypass will remove approximately two thirds of existing trunk road traffic from the village. That will reduce congestion, delay and vehicle pollution in the village, which will benefit not only residents but those on longer journeys from the M25—perhaps all the way to my hon. Friend's constituency.

As with all improvements to the A21, this scheme is located in the high weald area of outstanding natural beauty; the design and construction of the scheme has consequently been handled in a way that respects the sensitivity of the environment through which it passes. Of particular note is the land bridge that forms part of the scheme. A land bridge is somewhat wider than a normal bridge with space on each side for planting.

As I mentioned earlier, the scheme for dualling the A21 from the end of the Tonbridge bypass to the start of the Pembury bypass entered the Government's targeted programme of improvements in July 2003. In December 2004, the Government announced the investment of £950 million in regional transport infrastructure in the south-east. That is in addition to the £1 billion being invested in national schemes, which includes a major upgrading of the M25.

Even with that level of investment, the number of schemes coming forward was greater than could be accommodated, and decisions had to be made on which schemes could be included in the programme. It was subsequently decided that the A21 Tonbridge to Pembury dualling scheme would be remitted to the regions for advice on priorities. Remitting schemes to the regions is happening throughout the country. We are trying to engage the local regional bodies in informing decisions on major schemes; in the past, the Highways Agency may have had a link with local bodies, but not the sort that we now intend. If the scheme is a priority for the south-east, I am sure that it will be indicated to us through the Highways Agency; the scheme can then move up the agenda.

Mr. Norman: Will the Minister accept that, as expressed by the Government, the purpose of the "Access to Hastings" study and subsequent consultation was exactly that—to involve the regional authorities and local people so that they could express an opinion on whether improving the A21 was a priority? In a sense, regional involvement has already taken place. Further to that, will he tell us exactly what form the consultation will take, how long it will last and who will be consulted and involved?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, of course. There was consultation on the multi-modal studies, and some good work was done locally, but we are now prioritising the funding. Funding has been allocated to the various regions as fairly as we can, but we now want the local bodies to give an indication of their priorities for funding.

[Mr. Jamieson]

The hon. Gentleman raised previously the link made in the planning permission for a new Pembury hospital. I emphasise that one condition of the planning permission relating to the A21 restricts the level of occupancy of the hospital until the start of construction of the Tonbridge to Pembury dualling, or until the completion of suitable mitigation measures to junctions on the A21 in the vicinity of the hospital. Options are open to the developer as a result, and the Highways Agency is willing to discuss the way forward in order to obtain the full opening of the hospital in advance of the start of construction of the Tonbridge to Pembury scheme if that should turn out to be the case.

Mr. Norman: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Jamieson: I shall certainly give way, but it will make it almost impossible to answer the hon. Gentleman in full.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister still has five minutes.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I know.

Mr. Norman: May I gently point out that the idea of investing £200 million in a new general hospital at Pembury and not doing anything about the road is a manifestly unco-ordinated strategy? Is the Minister telling us that even if the regional bodies say that it is not a priority, the Government will still want to go ahead with the hospital? If so, how does he propose overcoming the planning condition stating that it cannot be achieved?

Mr. Jamieson: Surely the hon. Gentleman will have noted that the Government are providing the funding for the new hospital, as well as the money for the road. He did not say that, and anyone reading the report of the debate might reflect on the probability of either of those things happening under a Conservative Government, if that had continued from 1997, or in the unlikely event of a Conservative Government after the next general election. I have said that whatever the state of progress of the dualling of the section of the road in question, the Highways Agency is willing to consider how the hospital can have a full opening when it is completed.

The Kippings Cross to Lamberhurst improvement entered the Government's targeted programme of improvements in May 2004. The scheme will link the southern end of the Pembury bypass to the northern end of the Lamberhurst bypass. When that scheme and the Tonbridge to Pembury dualling have been completed the A21 will be a continuous dual carriageway from the M25 to the south of Lamberhurst. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the completion of those schemes in due course will bring significant improvement to the existing A21 through Kent.

In line with the Government's announcement in December 2004 the scheme will not be constructed until after 2008, and it has also been remitted to the regions for advice on priority. Moving further down the A21, the Government are aware of the problems on the section between Lamberhurst and Flimwell. Both the Kippings Cross to Lamberhurst and Flimwell to Robertsbridge schemes will provide journey time and accident savings, with Kippings Cross to Lamberhurst providing the missing link, so to speak, between the Pembury bypass and the Lamberhurst bypass, and the Flimwell to Robertsbridge stretch providing a reduction in community severance.

The Highways Agency has been liaising with the hon. Gentleman about the development of measures to deal with problems at the largest accident cluster on the relevant stretch of the A21, on which I know my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye has a view—the Bedgebury junction on the short stretch of dual carriageway north of Flimwell. It is planned that the measures will be implemented in May, and, together with other small scale safety schemes that are to be brought forward as and when they are identified, they are considered sufficient to deal with the safety issues until a scheme for the upgrading can be brought forward in due course.

The matter of the safety of the Bedgebury junction was identified during consultation on the Flimwell to Robertsbridge scheme. Consequently that scheme has been extended northwards to include the junction and a roundabout is now planned to replace the existing junction. The Flimwell to Robertsbridge improvement is the fourth major scheme on the A21. Hon. Members will recall that it is the one that was abandoned in 1996. Although only a small part of the scheme is in Kent—most of it is in East Sussex—it demonstrates the Government's total commitment to the upgrading of the A21.

I announced the preferred route for the scheme only two weeks ago, on 17 February, and that marked yet another major step forward for the A21 to Hastings. In addition to tackling the safety issues at Bedgebury, that five-and-a-half-mile scheme will provide much-needed traffic relief to the villages of Flimwell, Hurst Green and Silver Hill.

To conclude, I hope that the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells and his right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling will appreciate that with four major schemes on the A21 the Government are committed to its upgrading. The Lamberhurst bypass will open next week and others will follow in due course. I hope that the debate has been a reasonable airing of the issues, but if the hon. Gentleman wants further discussion with me and the Department I shall be happy for that to happen.

4.4 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

Freight (Tees Valley)

4.17 pm

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East) (Lab): I am very happy to have secured the debate after several attempts to do so. I have been lucky.

I want to focus on two things. First, how can we make local freight movements environmentally sound and improve them on non-road connections to the ports of Tees and Hartlepool? Secondly, I want the freight originating in my area to be switched from road to rail. My constituency is a typical Tees valley constituency. Many of my constituents work in traditional industries such as chemicals, steel, heavy engineering and mining—industries that generate a large tonnage of bulk products and use large volumes of bulk products in their manufacturing processes.

Other industries in my constituency are also bulk producers. At Boulby in east Cleveland, we have Britain's only deep potash mine, which directly employs some 600 people and produces potash and rock salt. Teesside is also home to Britain's largest deep-sea ports, which regularly host huge vessels of more than 200,000 tonnes. Tees and Hartlepool—operated by PD Ports, Logistics and Shipping—represent the second largest port in Britain in terms of tonnage and handle a significant amount of the United Kingdom's exports. That tonnage has the potential to grow very rapidly.

More than 53 million tonnes of goods of all sorts are moved through local ports per annum. Steel, chemicals, general goods and potash are all moved in bulk. The port is becoming an important player in roll-on, roll-off ferry freight operations and is also able to handle container traffic. Goods pour in from all continents, although much is moved in ways that do not impact on the local road network. For example, potash and salt from the mine at Boulby are shipped by rail freight wagons direct to the port five times a day. Similarly, often five or more trains per day carry steel to the docks. Many liquid chemicals coming into the port are shipped to the end users by pipeline. However, much of the traffic still ends up on local roads and moves through my constituency on its way further north or to Scotland or the midlands.

A good proportion of such traffic accesses the national road network, but much of it mixes with local traffic on some of the busiest roads in my constituency. The A172, known as the Marton road, takes more than 12,000 vehicles a day. In some places, the road is only slightly wider than the average country highway. It runs through residential areas and also serves the largest hospital in the Tees valley area, the James Cook university hospital. Drastic minimalisation of the HGV traffic using that road would free up the commuter flows and make access to the hospital quicker for everyone.

There is a far bigger reason for it being desirable to improve rail connections to the port: that would allow the port to pursue ambitious expansion plans and also ensure that we could even out UK regional disparities. As most people know, the global shipping trade is increasing almost exponentially. Ship sizes are increasing to accommodate more exports and larger containers. Those factors combine to produce a requirement for increased UK and mainland Europe port capabilities to accommodate the new bigger ships, each carrying more than 8,000 containers. More and larger UK port capacity is required, and deep-sea capacity is necessary for the UK to remain competitive in that important growth market.

The main container-handling ports are in the south of England. Overcrowding and delays at those ports are getting worse. Exporters to the UK do not place great weight on the exact port location. The most important factors are capacity, waiting time and turnaround on unloading and loading. Southampton container terminal has suffered problems with congestion of berths, long dwell times for stored containers and delays for hauliers collecting boxes.

Felixstowe recently opened its completed port extension four years after applying for permission, but the capacity created will cope with only one year's anticipated growth in UK deep-sea container volumes. Other ports, including Felixstowe and Harwich, are awaiting the outcome of public inquiries on planning applications for new terminals. More than 2 million containers entering the UK each year are destined for locations in the north. The southern location of the main UK deep-sea ports means longer road journeys to deliver to the north of England, creating further congestion and pollution.

Bringing containers to the south for road transfer to the north adds, on average, about 150 miles per container to the journey. That process creates congestion and adds to pollution. In the south, the rail lines are already overworked with commuter passenger traffic. Acting to improve connections to Tees port would take pressure off the national UK road network. As recently as July 2004, introducing the Government's transport White Paper, the Secretary of State said:

> "We also intend to take a long-term approach to port development and will publish a review of the policy framework for ports by the end of next year."—[Official Report, 20 July 2004; Vol. 424, c. 160.]

PD Ports' deep-sea container port development at Tees port would help to ensure that the UK was in a position to exploit the growing global shipping market and on a level playing field with its European competitors.

The existing port and planned development will attract retailers and others to construct import and distribution centres in the Tees area. There is room to develop up to six distribution centres near Tees port, each capable of providing up to 200 to 300 new jobs. The deep-sea container port development will also create between 200 and 300 new dock-related positions and a significant number of indirect jobs in the ports, logistics and shipping sectors, estimated at between 1,000 and 1,500.

Creating that gateway to the north would remove more than 1 million containers from the UK's southern roads, thereby drastically reducing congestion, but the Government need to take a strategic view of all UK port capacity, particularly that in the north, before deciding whether to allow southern ports to expand. The key to improving UK national port structure and to the aspirations of the ports of Tees and Hartlepool lies in enhancing port rail links.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Based on my conversations with the management of Tees port, which is in my constituency although close to that of my hon. Friend, I can confirm that they are willing and ambitious to expand their container resources hugely. Their proposal would generate about 3,000 jobs, which are much needed in the Tees valley, as it still has higher unemployment than much of the rest of the country. Tees port management asserts that Tees port could supply much of the north of England's container traffic needs. Is it my hon. Friend's understanding that supplying that traffic by rail, which is the optimal way of doing it, would require substantial enhancement of the gauge and tunnelling of rail links? Is he arguing for such investment?

[Vera Baird]

Dr. Kumar: I thank my hon. and learned Friend for that contribution. I am about to turn to the issue of rail. I endorse everything she said; it is in similar spirit to what Tees port management said to me.

Tees port is linked by a spur line originating on the Saltburn to Darlington rail corridor. An analysis of the necessary improvements shows the need for signalling improvements on the spur. It is estimated that those would cost £1.2 million and produce savings in reduced road transport costs of more than £17.9 million in 10 years. The rest of the branch line would need investment to carry what are called "high cube" large containers, which are the industry standard. That would require gauge improvements to a tunnel near Yarm or the provision of a new chord on to the east coast main line near Darlington. That might also look costly, but I believe that that cost would be more than outweighed by the savings made in getting HGVs off the road network.

Where do we go from here? I believe that the essential starting point must be for the Strategic Rail Authority and Network Rail to see the great opportunity of improving links to Tees port. Tragically, as things stand, they do not see it. Indeed, in the key freight document "Gauging Policy", issued in November 2004, the SRA identified only two "strategic route priorities" for gauging improvements. Amazingly, both are in the south. One priority is to improve the line from Southampton to the west midlands; the other is to improve the line from Felixstowe to the east midlands and West Yorkshire. The short and comparatively cheap option of improving the corridor from Tees port to the national network is considered to be only a possible future opportunity.

I ask the Minister to ask the SRA and her officials to query that policy, as it only adds to yet more investment for the relatively wealthy south and does not even begin to address the issue of the key port access improvements identified in the Northern Way growth strategy. Those improvements could be made quickly and cheaply. If PD Ports knew that there was genuine commitment to them, it would be prepared to invest in new expanded port facilities. Indeed, my hon. and learned Friend has heard it say so several times. This is a great opportunity for public investment and for generating private investment.

I conclude by saying that I hope I have enhanced the case for improving the environment and so benefiting my constituents, for helping the economy of part of the north-east and for reducing the environmental overheating of the south-east. In short, I propose a golden solution—a win-win situation for my constituents, the Tees valley in general and the UK as a whole. It richly deserves to be considered an overarching issue for the policy document that the Government are preparing and which will be issued later this year.

I hope that I have made my case seriously and that the Minister responds with positive suggestions.

4.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar) on securing the debate and on providing the Chamber with the opportunity to discuss sustainable freight distribution in the north and through the Tees port. He has raised several issues that I shall try to address.

The Government are committed to supporting industry by helping to ensure the efficient, free and reliable movement of goods. Our policies to achieve that are set out in "The Future of Transport" and "The Future of Rail" White Papers, providing a framework in which the freight industry can contribute to our continuing economic growth.

We have made real progress. Rail freight volume has increased steadily, rising by more than 45 per cent. since 1995. Almost 19 billion tonnes of freight were moved by rail in 2004. The market share of freight moved by rail has also increased since 1995, and it is estimated that industry has invested some £1.5 billion in rail freight since privatisation.

Certain rail freight initiatives are also being driven forward, the most important of which is the proposal that freight operators and their customers will be given long-term access contracts. That will provide the stability and certainty needed to enable the industry to grow and invest. Indeed, that process has already started. The Office of the Rail Regulator is currently consulting the industry on this very matter.

Of course, structural issues, though important, are not the be all and end all of the Government's support for rail freight. The Department for Transport also provides extremely significant levels of financial support to take freight off road and on to rail through direct and indirect subsidy. Perhaps the most important way in which the Government provide funding is through the funding of the national rail network. Freight-operating companies are charged only for the incremental costs that they impose through their use of the network. All the core costs of the network are picked up through track access charges paid by franchised passenger operators, and by direct grant from the Government.

The Government also provide substantial grant support for freight—well over £20 million a year for each of the next two years. That support has helped to create the impressive growth in rail freight that I mentioned, and the company neutral revenue support scheme has taken more than 600,000 container journeys off the roads in the past year.

However, my hon. Friend really wants to know what the Government are doing for Tees valley, and I am happy to tell him, and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), that the Government are doing a great deal. Two major grants have been made under the company neutral revenue support scheme to support the transport of intermodal containers out of Tees port by rail. They will provide about £200,000 of funding this year and in each of the next two years, and will take up to 4,000 containers a year off the roads of the Tees valley.

In addition, the Strategic Rail Authority has recently announced a track access grant for the movement of chemical products from Tees port to Workington, which will remove a further 1,462 lorry journeys from the roads. Finally, in 2000, we made two substantial freight facilities grants, totalling over £800,000, to provide funding to support capital investment. That supported the transport of potash to the port, and the facilities became operational in 2002. Those grants are helping to remove 9,700 lorry journeys from the road every year. The Government's commitment to supporting the transfer of freight from road to rail in the Tees valley and beyond should therefore be very clear.

It is, however, vital to ensure that the Government get the best possible value for money from their freight grants programmes, and last month the Department for Transport outlined its proposals for future freight grants through the sustainable distribution fund. That will ensure that grant funding is allocated across rail, water and road schemes in a way that focuses clearly on the objectives of reducing congestion, pollution and the impact on the environment. With the creation of that fund, we were also pleased to announce the reopening of the freight facilities grant—from April 2007—to rail schemes in England, enabling applications to be made for grants to purchase new assets or to replace assets necessary for the carriage of freight by rail. That will help to meet the need for rail freight facilities in the regions, where they can be shown to offer real benefits.

I take my hon. Friend's point about the adverse impact of HGVs on roads and congestion, and the real need to move freight from the road to rail. I can assure him that the way in which congestion impacts on pollution and other environmental issues will be a key factor in determining which schemes receive support. Taking freight on to the railways is not the only way to tackle congestion. We also need to ensure that we make best use of existing road capacity—and the Government are providing important funding to ensure that that is done.

In Middlesbrough, for instance, the council has been awarded a local transport plan block allocation of £3.94 million for 2005–06. That will support small schemes across the borough to reduce congestion and improve accessibility, safety and the local environment. The figure includes more than £800,000 for structural maintenance of the A171 Cargo Fleet lane, which parallels the A172 Marton road and provides access to the western end of Tees port. The Department for Transport has provisionally approved up to £11 million of funding for the major north Middlesbrough accessibility improvements scheme, subject to further development.

The Department is keen to ensure that the freight industry has the necessary support and infrastructure to deliver a continued rise in rail freight movement. I understand my hon. Friend's point about the impact of increased traffic from south-east ports on road networks across the country, including those in the Tees valley. That is why the Government have invested heavily in infrastructure projects that benefit the transfer of freight from port by rail. My hon. and learned Friend raised the issue of PD Teesport's intention to proceed with a container facility there. The Department looks forward to receiving that ambitious application. Indeed, we are doing much ongoing work in order to facilitate the use of large containers on rail.

My hon. Friend spoke about the infrastructure work that has to be done to facilitate that move, but much has already been done. Last October saw the completion of the Felixstowe-Nuneaton gauge enhancement project on time and under budget. That will enable the larger 9 ft 6 in containers to be carried by rail from our largest container port to key freight terminals in the midlands, Wales and the north of England. Likewise, capacity improvements in the Cherwell valley, linking the port of Southampton to the west coast main line, were completed in May last year, which will benefit freight as well as passenger rail.

The SRA has done some extremely good work with the industry in developing a good, value-for-money proposal to make the entire line between Southampton and the west coast main line suitable for 9ft 6in containers. The Government are now discussing with the industry how the project can be funded. However, the enhancement does not need to have the word freight attached to it to be of benefit. The upgrade to the west coast main line is expected to provide increased capacity for freight traffic from the channel ports, and will considerably improve links to the north-west and Scotland. The increased level of track renewals being carried out by Network Rail is also of enormous benefit to freight operators.

As my hon. Friend knows, having inherited a shambles of an infrastructure, the Government are making a huge investment, which is greatly improving the opportunities for carrying freight by rail. Indeed, the Office of the Rail Regulator last week went out to consultation on a new framework for investment in rail infrastructure enhancements. The Government's agenda is to encourage the carriage of freight by rail whenever possible. Clearly, my hon. Friend is rightly impatient for that agenda to benefit his constituency. However, it does not stop at the south-east ports. It is important also for the north-east and the rest of the country.

As I said at the beginning, we are committed to driving forward the continued success of rail freight, both across the country and in the north-east of England. I assure my hon. Friend and my right hon. and learned Friend that, as part of the new regional assessment of transport needs and the new structure of rail, we will endeavour to achieve the best for rail freight and sustainable freight distribution in general.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate and for representing his constituents, who I know are concerned about congestion and about the regional development of the north-east. My hon. Friend wants to ensure that the port facilities in his patch create the best possible environment for economic development.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes to Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 2 March 2005

[MR. FRANK COOK in the Chair]

Post-primary Schools (Northern Ireland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

9.30 am

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): I welcome the opportunity offered by this Adjournment debate on admissions arrangements for post-primary schools, a subject that is important to many people in Northern Ireland. Retaining our successful grammar schools and the principle of academic selection in Northern Ireland are key priorities for the Democratic Unionist party. The Province's pupils consistently produce the best examination results in the United Kingdom. The recent consultative document from Northern Ireland's Department of Education on new admissions arrangements to post-primary schools confirms neighbourhood comprehensives as the inevitable outcome of the transfer procedure changes that the Government are seeking. In ruling out academic selection, the Government are excluding the principle that the majority of parents obviously support.

We reject utterly the Government's vision of post-primary education in Northern Ireland. An unaccountable Sinn Fein Minister and the Costello report attempted to ignore the fact that almost two thirds of parents in the Province opposed the Burns report proposals to end academic selection. Now, direct rule Ministers are doing the same. Indeed, I am informed that several schools have applied to the Department for consultation response booklets on behalf of parents, but that the Department has refused to give the schools the booklets, saying that individual parents must contact it directly. I am not aware of such practice in other Departments in Northern Ireland.

Is the Minister afraid of public opinion coming out against the proposals yet again, and thus attempting to limit the parental response? Surely it matters not how a parent obtains the consultation response document. If we are about open government, we should be encouraging more people to participate in the consultation process. Will the Minister deal with such matters in his response? Students should be placed in the school that best suits their needs on the basis of ability, not by postcode or the ability to pay.

Despite excellent exam results in the Province, there are undoubtedly areas for improvement. We need to enhance the qualifications of those not so academically gifted. Children from areas of social deprivation do less well—an issue that we want to address. It is important that more young people from working-class areas reach grammar school and university. It is through a process of academic selection that they are given the best opportunity of proceeding to higher educational attainment.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the consequence of the imposition of comprehensive education in Northern Ireland will be an independently funded education sector for the well-off and no provision for working-class children? The consequence of comprehensive education in England in the '60s and '70s is to be imposed on us to the detriment of working-class children.

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that helpful intervention; he is absolutely right. I have spoken to those associated with some of the voluntary grammar schools in Northern Ireland and they are clear that, if the Minister proceeds down the road on which he has embarked, the result may well be that we have private fee-paying schools in Northern Ireland. That will not create the type of social equality that he talks about; it will increase the gap between those who have and those who have not in educational terms.

The current method of testing children at the age of 11 must be improved, so that it is less stressful for them. I have had two young children go through the transfer system and I know the pressures that it places on families. Those in my party support the scrapping of the current 11-plus transfer test, but we believe that it ought to be replaced by a new assessment system that includes academic selection on transfer. Tests could be conducted over a longer period, such as two or three years, and in-class monitoring by teachers during the latter years of primary school could also contribute towards the transfer procedure.

By persisting with their current policy, the Government could rob Northern Ireland of one of its key selling points. It is also flying in the face of what the Minister knows to be the wishes of the majority of people living in Northern Ireland. The public want a system of education that includes academic selection and allows everyone, regardless of their economic background, an opportunity to attend grammar schools—in short, a system that produces pupils educated to the highest standards within the United Kingdom. People in Northern Ireland are proud of what the education system allows individuals to achieve and that academic excellence is open to everyone. At present, the doors of grammar schools are open to everyone in Northern Ireland, not just the rich or those whose parents were educated at grammar schools. Under the Minister's proposals, I fear that the net result, whether he intends it or not, will be the opposite.

Martin McGuinness's consultation received an unprecedented reply from 200,551 households in Northern Ireland. Some 64 per cent. of respondents demanded the retention of academic selection. McGuinness, clearly shocked by the results, tried to massage the figures, but his protestations simply did not wash. He claimed that teaching sectors and unions were in favour of abolishing academic selection. How wrong he was: among teachers in Northern Ireland, the response was an emphatic 62 per cent. in favour of retaining academic selection for determining post-primary placement.

In desperation, McGuinness then tried to claim that the responses were skewed due to the motivation of the grammar sector in Northern Ireland. However, it is clear that almost one third of Northern Ireland households replied, two thirds of which disagreed with the Minister and current Government policy. Such a high level of return in a Government consultation process is a mark of just how concerned parents are about the current direction of policy.

[Mr. Donaldson]

Not only was that concern reflected in the Department's household consultative responses, the Omnibus survey for the same period also showed a clear majority in favour of retaining academic selection. It is clear that the people of Northern Ireland and the teachers and the parents of children in the Province wish academic selection to be maintained. The majority of political representatives in Northern Ireland also favour academic selection. The Government should not seek to frustrate the wishes of the people of Northern Ireland.

On the day that the Northern Ireland Assembly was suspended, Martin McGuinness moved quickly to abolish the 11-plus without any consideration of an alternative system for post-primary transfer. It is sad that the Government have continued to pursue that flawed and unpopular policy.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): Would it not be fair to say that all Mr. McGuinness did was issue a press release? What then happened was that the Government proceeded to abolish academic selection.

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his intervention, and he is right. It is sad that the Government have chosen to go down that road in the face of public opinion.

The issues of the transfer test and retaining our grammar schools are extremely emotive, and we readily accept that there is an expectation among many parents that the current 11-plus should be replaced. However, there is also an expectation that the grammar system and academic excellence should be retained. The way forward is clear: we must retain what is best about our education system while reforming what is outdated and ineffective. The Government, in their haste to end the outdated current 11-plus, have failed to take account of how their actions will destroy what is best for academic achievement. They have signalled the end of academic selection from 2008. Such a policy is folly. Decisions should not be taken on narrow ideological grounds; instead the Government should pursue a fresh direction that is in the best interests of all the children of Northern Ireland.

The Costello report is portrayed as a win for all. Those who opposed academic selection were bought off with the promise that it would go by 2009 and that children could opt out sooner. Those who supported academic selection were told that their primary school children would not be affected by any change on account of the time scale involved in delivering a replacement. Grammar school supporters were informed that grammar schools would stay, even though no explanation has been given as to how schools based on delivering an academic education can find those children best suited for their school without academic selection. Parents were told that they would have maximum opportunities to exercise choice in determining the best school for their child.

However, the reality is that some 60 per cent. of post-primary schools in Northern Ireland are already over-subscribed each year. That situation can only deteriorate under the Government's proposals. New admissions arrangements do not offer parents equal choice: if they live outside the immediate catchment area of the school of their choice, they will lose out. Parents will have to get their child into one of the feeder schools of a so-called "good" school—in the event of over-subscription, those are also catchment-area based, and sometimes tightly so, even down to house numbers. That clearly works in favour of the middle classes and those in towns. How can it possibly be a fairer system than the current one?

The Northern Ireland education ethos has always been of a system offering opportunity for all. Aspects of the system have failed some sections of society, particularly working-class Protestants. The current system requires reform, but it should not be abandoned. The Government propose the replacement of academic selection with a system that would allow the better-off to send their children to modern, vibrant schools, while the underprivileged would be offered no such opportunity.

David Burnside: Does the hon. Gentleman, my friend, agree that there is already evidence in Northern Ireland of people with money moving and buying houses near the best grammar schools in the Province? There are examples in Belfast and in my constituency—in the case of Ballyclare high and Antrim grammar schools—of people moving to take advantage of their wealth, which ordinary working-class people cannot do.

Mr. Donaldson: Again I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention; he is absolutely right. I see that happening in my constituency, too. In the city of Lisburn there are two excellent grammar schools—Friends and Wallace high schools—and some excellent secondary schools. However, the developers are already eyeing up available land close to the grammar schools, because they know that those houses will be at a premium and they will be able to name their price. That ridiculous situation creates social inequality, which the Minister says he is determined to address with his proposals. I urge him to set aside the ideological rhetoric and work with politicians and the education sector in Northern Ireland to deliver an education system that commands support across the community. Costello clearly fails to meet those criteria and should be abandoned.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): Will the hon. Gentleman explain whether he and his colleagues in the Democratic Unionist party support the proposal—not an Ulster Unionist party proposal—that the procedures that apply in England and Wales, whereby parents in the locality of a grammar school can vote to retain it, should apply in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Donaldson: That would be a kind of local referendum to retain a grammar school, and I am not sure that we want to go down that road. However, I am not against the principle of local solutions such as the Dickson plan in Craigavon. I have not heard the Minister explain what will happen with the Dickson plan under his new proposals; I hope that he will address that, because it affects my constituency and that of the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble). Are we going to go down the road of local solutions and retain the Dickson plan?

I say to the hon. Lady that I have concerns about the idea of referendums to determine the retention of grammar schools. I would much rather we retain grammar schools within the existing education system so that they are accessible to everyone. That is a solution, and there is a large degree of consensus between our two parties on that issue.

Mr. Trimble: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his reference to the Dickson plan. It is my view, and that of a number of other people in the area, that if selection on the basis of academic merit disappears, the Dickson plan will disappear with it, although the hon. Gentleman may wish to take account of the fact that a significant number of people in the educational establishment seem to be moving towards selection at 14, which is one of the features of the Dickson plan.

Mr. Donaldson: The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. That debate has been part of the discussion about Burns and Costello, yet both reports fail adequately to address whether the Dickson plan will be retained. As far as I am aware from my contact with the schools and those affected by it, the Dickson plan has been a success in the Craigavon area. I do not advocate that solution for the whole of Northern Ireland, but I wonder why the Department seems to have ignored the issue.

In respect of how the proposals will work in practice, the accusation has been made that the key stage 2 curriculum is skewed by the existence of the transfer test, because schools devote time to practice tests and encourage the learning of key facts by repetition. None the less, statistics from 2003 show that at key stage 2 in English and mathematics more pupils from Northern Ireland reach the expected standards than their counterparts in Great Britain.

We fully accept the public will that the 11-plus should be abolished as soon as is practical; however, we do not accept that the ending of an imperfect test should be equated with the ending of any form of academic differentiation at 11. Children do not all have the same abilities or interests and it is wrong to suggest that they do so by seeking to enforce a comprehensive system of education in Northern Ireland.

The Government propose the introduction of the pupil profile, which will be drawn up by primary school teachers and may be given to the desired post-primary school prior to a parental interview. However, the Government say that the pupil profile will not be the basis for selection. How can the Minister defend the fact that there is no requirement for parents to show the profile to the receiving school, or even to discuss their child going to the school with either the primary or the post-primary head teacher? Surely the Minister is not so naive as to suppose that parents will automatically, and unerringly, choose the right school for their child, especially if primary teachers are less than honest in their assessment of the pupil's ability. There will be pressures on primary school teachers in drawing up the pupil profile.

How can a child who lives closest to a former grammar school get a place because of the distance criterion, when a child who lives further away but who has more academic ability cannot get in? How can that be just? It will cause confusion to parents who will see the pupil profile as a key and, perhaps, decisive influence on the transfer process. They will in turn often put enormous pressure on primary school teachers and principals to accentuate the child's strengths and downplay its potential weaknesses. The pupil profile without academic selection simply creates false expectations for parents, who will place considerable weight on it, even though the Minister claims that it will not be the basis for selection. If there is no test, and no other tangible means of assessing the child's ability, it is inevitable that parents will see the pupil profile as the basis for selection, even if that is not the Department's intention.

The preparation of the pupil profile will mean additional work for primary school teachers and principals. What consultations have been held with them about the pupil profile? Without objective testing and external moderation, the new admissions arrangements put the P5, P6 and P7 teachers and primary headmasters in the firing line. The pressure on them to state that a child is capable of pursuing an academic course will be tremendous if it is based on class work and a class teacher assessment, albeit moderated within a school. Does the Minister agree that even if the pupil profile is not to be used—or even seen—by the receiving school, primary school teachers will be under greater pressure?

The implications for post-primary schools are also a matter of concern. Under the Government's proposals, each parent has the right to an interview with the school or schools of their choice prior to selection, which could have significant consequences for such schools, with hundreds of one-to-one interviews being required with principals during the November period designated by the Department. The new admissions arrangements refer a great deal to the objectivity of the pupil profile, but there is no indication as to how that objectivity is to be achieved. It cannot possibly be objective if it is based only on internal assessment. It is also not comparable with that for other children of the same age if there is no external moderation. There can be no consistency, as promised in the new arrangements document, if there is not some external moderation. How does the Minister propose to ensure the objectivity and consistency promised in the consultation document?

Despite 35 years of civil unrest, our pupils in both grammar and secondary schools have consistently out-performed their counterparts in Great Britain at GCSE and A-level. In 2002, 58.7 per cent. of Northern Ireland pupils obtained five or more A* to C grades at GCSE compared with 52.5 per cent. of pupils in England and Wales. Fewer of our pupils left without any qualifications. The pattern is similar at A-level, with Northern Ireland pupils out-performing their peers in England and Wales by a considerable margin. So why does the Minister want to change the system when it is working? Why does he want to give us the same system that is failing children in England and Wales? Parents in Northern Ireland cannot understand that.

The Minister's claim that our pupils trail behind Great Britain on the average points statistic is grossly misleading. Employers, universities, pupils and parents regard GCSE grades A* to C as pass grades, but the points system in the Costello report awards points to grades lower than C. That means that a pupil with five C grades at GCSE would have a lower points score than someone who obtained five D grades and two E grades. Moreover, it has been publicly acknowledged by failing comprehensives in England that they have abandoned GCSEs in favour of BTEC qualifications in order to achieve better results—a practice that is not widespread in Northern Ireland.

[Mr. Donaldson]

The results published by the Programme for International Student Assessment for 2003—an assessment of 15-year-old students—suggest that Northern Ireland has one of the best performing education systems in the world. The average score across all Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries in each subject area was around 500 points. In Northern Ireland, the average scores were 515 in mathematics, 517 in reading and 524 in science. In reading, mathematics and science only two OECD countries did significantly better than Northern Ireland. Only pupils from Finland and Korea performed better in reading, and only Finnish and Japanese pupils did significantly better in science. The Minister was forced to admit:

"the performance of our young people continues to be well above the international average, in all the areas assessed."

The PISA findings did not make pleasant reading for Ministers, as 15-year-olds in England scored worse in mathematics, science and reading than pupils from 17 other industrialised countries. Yet the Minister wants to keep the system in England and to remove the system that is currently succeeding in Northern Ireland by international standards. I and many people in Northern Ireland believe that the Minister has got it wrong. We have a system that is working and when something is working one should not try to fix it. One should try to improve it, but not abandon it as the Minister appears to be doing with his current proposals. Why are the Department and the Government so intent on destroying a post-primary system in Northern Ireland that produces such fine achievements at all levels, only to replace it with a system that has patently failed to produce either good academic standards or social equality in England and Wales?

The question of admissions criteria also needs to be looked at closely. In the end, with more than 60 per cent. of schools in Northern Ireland currently oversubscribed, admissions criteria will be a major factor in determining where pupils are educated and what schools they attend. Four sets of criteria are set out in the consultation document: family-focused, community-based, geographical, and the so-called tie-breakers. The fact is that three of the four are in reality based on geographical criteria. The family-focused criteria include whether any siblings are currently at the school, and clearly the location of the school is a factor in that. As for the community-based criteria, feeder primary schools and the location of the parish are issues; again, geography comes into that. Then we have the geographical criteria themselves, with school-centred and child-centred catchment areas. Finally, there are the tie-breakers, which include a consideration of proximity of a school to home. In fact, one could argue that all four criteria are based on geography to a degree, but certainly the latter three are based primarily on geography.

That, I believe, will result in the kind of situation that the hon. Member for South Antrim (David Burnside) mentioned earlier—some schools will be popular, and parents who can afford to do so will move close to them, because when it comes down to the tie-breaker, it is a matter of either random selection or proximity of a school to home. That will create social inequality in Northern Ireland when it comes to education, and that is simply not acceptable. What are the parents supposed to do in my constituency, in places such as Moira and Annahilt, when they do not have a grammar school within miles, and when the feeder primary schools may be outside the catchment area? Moira in particular is on the edge of the Dickson plan area; parents there are in something of a quandary about all that. They are going to lose out, and why should they? Why should someone lose out simply because of where they were born or where they live?

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim) (UUP): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that pupils from rural areas in all constituencies in Northern Ireland would be immediately disadvantaged?

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention; that was precisely the point that I was coming to. Especially in rural areas in Northern Ireland, pupils will be significantly disadvantaged because the Department is moving towards the closure of small rural schools and the consolidation of schools. That means that rural pupils, by virtue of where they live, will be significantly disadvantaged in Northern Ireland; that covers a significant proportion of the population in the Province.

Mr. Trimble: I take the point that the hon. Gentleman makes with regard to the consolidation of schools, but is it not the case that what is likely to happen next year is driven entirely by cost, with no effort having been made to consider what is necessary on educational grounds?

Mr. Donaldson: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman, not only on educational grounds, but as regards the very proposals and the new system that the Minister proposes to introduce. It seems that one policy is moving forward and another is being adapted, but the current policy does not reflect the implications of the proposals for transfer arrangements in terms of the location of new primary schools and so on.

Proposals that pupils should attend classes in different schools, and that teachers should teach lessons in more than one school, are impractical and misguided. We wholeheartedly support the development of properly accredited vocational courses and believe that it is important that society, and especially the world of work, recognise vocational qualifications as valid and valuable. We must break the cycle of society believing that only academic qualifications have status. That is where the Minister really ought to be concentrating his efforts. Also, he should be supporting the secondary schools that he claims are underperforming, where pupils in working-class areas are leaving without qualifications. Would not it be much better if the money that he is to spend on reforming the system and abandoning the current one were spent on investment in underperforming schools, on helping the pupils who need the help most, and in particular on developing vocational-type courses in those schools? Such courses would really, practically benefit the pupils and give them an opportunity for a future career from which they would really benefit.

David Burnside: On that point, does not the fact that the special money—what teachers in my constituency told me last week was the Chancellor's money—does not apply in Northern Ireland prove the Government's hypocrisy with regard to spending on "Education, education, education"? The extra money that the Government apply to education throughout the whole of the United Kingdom is not being applied fairly and on an equitable basis to Northern Ireland schools.

Mr. Donaldson: I agree with the hon. Gentleman and I hope that the Minister will address that point. Whether the Minister thinks that what the hon. Gentleman mentions is the reality or not, it is certainly the perception among many in the teaching and educational profession in Northern Ireland.

Under the Government's proposals, academically focused schools do not exist. It is ironic that specialist schools can exist to provide courses in sports science, drama, the performing arts, technology and computing but not in academic subjects. The Minister needs to address that issue clearly. To ensure a fair system of transfer at 11, the choice of pathways must be equally attractive and valued. Pupils with academic interests and abilities must have the opportunity to pursue those at a grammar school, while those with different talents and interests—who are no less valued—must be able to secure a place in a school that will cater for those. If the Minister believes that his proposals will enable grammar schools to continue in their current form, perhaps he will give us the information that I am afraid is lacking in his consultation document.

Society must be encouraged to afford all post-primary schools equal status. That should not just be bestowed but earned by performance and the resourcing and attitude of the Government towards all schools. The consultation document on new admissions arrangements for post-primary schools and the information on the performance of pupils provide no indication of how the Government intend to ensure objectivity.

As parents, we are not impartial judges of our children's educational potential—we need the input of professionals. Underachievement and inequality do not start at age 11. Any current research findings on school attainment levels show that pupils' performance is markedly affected by social class and cultural capital. For example, a recent survey carried out by the university of London's Institute of Education found that primary school pupils eligible for free school meals—an indicator of family poverty—began with lower scores in maths and literacy and fell further behind as they progressed up the school. That finding is duplicated in the O'Brien research carried out in the Irish Republic.

The current system of post-primary education in Northern Ireland, for all its faults, still sends a significantly higher number of pupils from working-class and disadvantaged backgrounds to higher education. Queen's university and the university of Ulster have among the highest levels of students from working-class backgrounds of all universities in the United Kingdom. I believe that the Minister's proposals will result in a reduction in the number of children from working-class backgrounds who make it through to higher education.

I could say so much more on this subject, but I am mindful that other right hon. and hon. Members may wish to speak before the Minister winds up the debate. However, I want to make an appeal to the Minister. A consensus is developing in Northern Ireland which he ignores at his peril. It is important that this issue should be handled sensitively because the decisions taken today will affect a future generation and will deeply affect Northern Ireland, because one of our best selling points is our education system.

The Minister should draw back from these proposals. At this stage, we do not know when the Northern Ireland Assembly will be reinstated, and there would be a consensus among Opposition Members that the sooner that happens—in the right circumstances and with those parties committed to exclusively peaceful and democratic means in government—the better. The Assembly should have the final say on this issue, representing, as it does, the people of Northern Ireland. The Minister should put this matter on hold until the Assembly is reinstated and allow the local parties to take the decisions on how we move the system forward.

David Burnside: On the very point of the Assembly, if it comes back—I do not expect that it will—would the hon. Gentleman's party give the commitment, as I wish that my party would, that we, the Unionist parties, will take the Department of Education and never again let it go into the hands of Sinn Fein?

Mr. Donaldson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. It is my belief that in the current circumstances, with Sinn Fein linked to an organisation that is involved in criminality and terrorism, it should not hold any departmental position, never mind the education portfolio. The Unionist parties should co-operate on this issue. I do not want to see a Sinn Fein Minister with responsibility for education in any future Executive. We need to give that priority, because it is a question of confidence. Many in the education system did not have confidence in the previous Minister and are disappointed that the current one has carried through the very flawed policies adopted by Martin McGuinness.

In conclusion, The Sunday Times "Parent Power" survey late last year placed 25 Northern Ireland schools in the top 200 UK secondary schools. Given our comparatively small population, that was a fantastic achievement. Such success will not be maintained by destroying academically oriented schools.

There is still plenty of room for improvement. My party and I want to be at the forefront in helping to achieve those improvements, particularly for children from working-class Protestant backgrounds in Northern Ireland. Investment is needed in those areas and in education and schools in those areas. That would benefit the whole community.

[Mr. Donaldson]

Compromising what is best about our education system is no way to proceed. We want a system that allows all children to reach their full potential.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would be helpful if right hon. and hon. Members would indicate early that they intend to contribute. Let me explain why.

It is the common convention in this Chamber to start the first of the three winding-up speeches 30 minutes before conclusion. That would mean that we have 23 minutes left under normal circumstances. However, on issues that have a particular local or regional interest, Mr. Speaker has made available the rule that the Chair can curtail the contributions from the two main Opposition Front-Bench spokespeople to five, rather than 10, minutes each. Someone is clearly after my job because they have looked ahead and seen the prospect of that, and I have a ready and willing offer to accept that rule. It looks as though I will have to apply it.

Therefore, we now have 32 minutes. I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will bear that time curtailment in mind when they make their submission, or when they accept or respond to interventions.

10.8 am

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): I will be very brief because I want to see all my friends from Northern Ireland get the chance to speak.

I just want to make two points. I am a product of a grammar school in Northern Ireland—Belfast royal academy—which, 40 years on, still contains a broad social mix and is producing excellent results. It is quite wrong of my Government to be pushing forward with this whole change to the education system in Northern Ireland.

There is a huge democratic deficit in Northern Ireland. We now have Ministers, some of whom probably had not been to Northern Ireland before they were appointed, trying to change an education system that has served the people of Northern Ireland extremely well. Those Ministers have no mandate in Northern Ireland—not a single person there voted for the Government currently running Northern Ireland, because of the ridiculous democratic deficit of not allowing Labour party members in Northern Ireland to be in any way organised.

I will continue from the final point made by the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson), whom I congratulate on securing this Adjournment debate. He said that the proposals should be withdrawn. The consensus on working towards a change in the transfer system—there is no doubt that change is needed—should be followed, and no decisions should be taken until the Assembly is back. It is wrong for any Minister, and for a Minister of this Government in particular because they take no votes from Northern Ireland, to blunder in, pick up a proposal from a known terrorist, Martin McGuinness, who threw it in at the very last minute of the previous Assembly, and take it on. It is wrong that that should happen. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister has just taken over the existing situation. I had hoped that he would listen, learn, look, talk to people, talk to head teachers and parents, and that he would take a different decision. I had hoped that he would not be carried along by the small group of people in the Northern Ireland Department of Education who have wanted to see the end of grammar schools for a very long time. Those people got their chance when Martin McGuinness was running things—I hope that we will never again have someone from his party running education. That small number of officials have been zealous in trying to end grammar schools. I am sorry that my Government are colluding in that, and I hope that, even at this stage, they will draw back from the policy.

There is no doubt that Northern Ireland education stands out in the United Kingdom as the best. We see that clearly from all the results. One particularly important figure is that fewer pupils in Northern Ireland leave school without any GCSEs than anywhere else in the UK. Many people who go to Northern Ireland are willing to take jobs there because of the excellence of the education system. We should not change the system radically in the way that the Minister suggests.

We can all agree that changes need to be made and that improvements are needed in some of our secondary schools. There are some excellent secondary schools in Northern Ireland, however, and the transfer between secondary and grammar schools, in areas where the schools work together is wonderful. Children really do have a choice, and as they grow older and it becomes obvious that they need to be at a different school, that is made much easier by the way in which the system works in Northern Ireland.

If we put an end to the current system, we will see a growth in the private sector—people will buy their way into a better education. At present, that does not happen: very few people are educated privately in Northern Ireland. That is a tribute to the education system. We should not destroy it, and we should certainly not destroy it without the support of the people of Northern Ireland and the representatives of the people of Northern Ireland. The Minister should listen to the Members of Parliament from Northern Ireland.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are 27 unallocated minutes available.

10.13 am

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim) (UUP): I will begin my remarks by again reminding the Government that the Ulster Unionist party remains totally opposed to the imposition of a comprehensive education system in Northern Ireland, for good reason. However, that reason, no matter how often it is repeated, not just by politicians but by parents and teachers, seems to be lost on this Government. We simply do not want our grammar school system to be replaced by a comprehensive one that has failed Great Britain.

It is not just Northern Ireland's elected representatives, teachers and parents who believe that the Government's plans are fatally flawed and will destroy the excellent system that already provides the best post-primary education available in the country. The United Kingdom's leading education expert, Dr. Chris Woodhead, expressed the same opinion. Speaking at the launch of Concerned Parents for Education's "Vision for the Future" document in Belfast last Wednesday, Dr. Woodhead dismissed the Government's plans as "crazy". He said:

"You have the best performing system in the United Kingdom. Why would you want to dismantle that?"

That is the very question that we have repeatedly asked the Government since the suspension of the Assembly in autumn 2002, and that they have consistently failed to answer. Perhaps the Minister will tell the House how grammar schools can be retained without academic selection.

We are rightly proud of our education system in Northern Ireland and are committed to raising standards in all our schools. Every parent wants the highest standard of education for their children. We must support all schools in focusing on the essentials and making the most of each child's abilities and aptitudes, thereby allowing every child to develop to their fullest potential. The comprehensive school system that the Costello proposals will create will inevitably introduce a hitherto unknown level of social division and put a high price on education for everyone. The system will pave the way for the expansion of independent schools, which will charge fees that will be unaffordable for most families. Moreover, in Northern Ireland, more pupils from deprived backgrounds go on to higher education than in England and Wales, and the difference between Northern Ireland and Scotland in that regard is even greater. Everyone in Northern Ireland has access to academic schools, regardless of income, property or domestic location, which is not the case in England and Wales.

I am shocked to hear the Minister, the hon. Member for Brent, East, advocating a comprehensive system that has failed the public and proved to be socially divisive in Great Britain. Rather than producing more division, would not the public be better served if the Government were to employ their resources in improving our primary and secondary schools? How can the Government justify promoting specialist schools in Great Britain, yet deny Northern Ireland the right to retain our academic specialist grammar schools and the opportunity to develop vocational specialisms in secondary schools?

In a statement to the House last year, the former Secretary of State for Education said of the education system in England and Wales,

"we expect all secondary schools to become specialist schools with a centre of excellence. They will now be able to take on a second specialism. High-performing specialist schools could become training schools or leaders of partnerships."—[Official Report, 8 July 2004; Vol. 423, c. 1012.]

In Northern Ireland, we have not even got our first centre of excellence and specialism in a secondary school. It strikes me as ironic that the Government support specialist schools in arts, technology, IT and sports, yet they are determined to remove schools that specialise in nothing other than academic excellence.

Parents, teachers and their political representatives have met with insurmountable Government intransigence. Clear and reasoned arguments are falling on deaf ears, and so are the wishes of 64 per cent. of the parents of Northern Ireland who expressed a desire to retain some form of academic selection. Ministers and officials appear determined to press ahead, regardless of how often the arguments are exposed as misleading and unrepresentative. Flawed arguments make for flawed policies. We do not wish to see a flawed comprehensive education system in Northern Ireland. The education of our children and the future of our region must not be based on over-generalised, over-simplistic educational theories.

The Government's Costello plan will introduce selection by postcode. In that way, choice of school will be determined by where people can afford to live rather than by their child's ability. A parent's right to choose the most appropriate and suitable school for their child will be taken away. Parents and a fair system of selection should determine the best schools for their children. As Dr. Woodhead concluded, there is no logic in jumping to the conclusion that if we are getting rid of the 11-plus, we might as well get rid of the grammar school system while we are at it. There is no correlation between the two.

The Ulster Unionist party will continue to work at Westminster in the way that it has done, representing the interests of all parents and protecting our children's education and schools from the Government's failed comprehensive agenda. That is why my party will continue to call for raised standards in all our schools, fight to keep our grammar schools, replace the 11-plus with a fairer system of academic selection, and defend parental choice and oppose the Costello recommendations.

Finally, I again call on the Government to adhere to the democratic wishes of the majority of the population in Northern Ireland, and to spare us from a failed comprehensive system, which has blighted the British education system for generations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Twenty-one unallocated minutes are available.

10.19 am

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): I wish to make just a few points. One of them concerns the decision taken by Martin McGuinness in his last minutes as Education Minister. Some of these points have been made publicly before, but it is important to make them again.

It is not widely known that there was a ministerial code during the operation of the Northern Ireland Executive. That code prescribed which decisions should be taken centrally and had to be brought before the Executive to be considered. It also contained provisions on how decisions would be made within the Executive. The code was, of course, known to all Ministers and to senior officials in the various Departments. It had not been published, because it was still being revised when the suspension began. Indeed, it was still on my desk. There were other reasons why it was still on my desk, which I might be inclined to go into on another occasion. I simply mention that there was that code.

Under the code, the decision in the education sector on the Burns report had to go to the Executive, but Mr. McGuinness had not yet brought the issue to the Executive. There was a simple reason for that: he knew that the Executive would never approve the decision. I can make that statement absolutely confidently. Even if the decision had been approved by the Executive, it would not have been approved by the Assembly, and the Minister would never have been able to get the appropriate legislation through the Assembly. That was known to those in the system; that would have been known to senior officials in the Department of Education. I do not know how they could have escaped that knowledge.

[Mr. David Trimble]

We then had the unusual situation of suspension. Of course, there are reasons why the Northern Ireland Executive and Assembly were suspended, which I shall not go into, but in the last half hour before suspension took effect, the press release was issued. The following crossed my mind afterwards and I am sorry now that no one pursued it: I do not think that the purported decision in the press release would have survived judicial review. That is the basis of the decision on which the Minister thinks he is depending. Previous Ministers knew that they were dealing with a purported decision that had no validity in terms of the Northern Ireland Executive, the Northern Ireland Assembly or the Northern Ireland people. Perhaps this Minister did not know that, but what he cannot do is in any way pray in aid the Burns report or what might have happened under the Assembly. What is happening now is entirely his responsibility.

Someone once described comprehensivisation in England as the greatest crime committed against the English working class in the 20th century. There is absolutely no doubt about that. Before comprehensivisation was introduced in England, performance in schools there was above that in Northern Ireland. It was only subsequent to comprehensivisation that performance levels and attainment in Northern Ireland got ahead of those in England, and they have moved steadily ahead. That is the comprehensive effect.

It is perfectly correct, as hon. Members have said, that if the proposals go ahead, we will have a public school sector in Northern Ireland. A fair number of Northern Ireland Members were educated in grammar schools, but I do not think that a single one present would have got to a grammar school had there been a public school system, because if the Minister's proposals go ahead, the only grammar schools will be public schools, where people have to pay substantial fees. People from a working-class or lower middle-class background, who have succeeded through merit, will find that channel denied to them.

I hate to have to say this, but it seems significant that the last time that this idea was attempted in Northern Ireland was in the 1970s by Lord Melchett when he was Education Minister. It was defeated by the opposition of society in Northern Ireland. It seems significant that the only times when this idea has been attempted in Northern Ireland under direct rule has been when we have had public school boys as Education Ministers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Seventeen minutes remain unallocated and available.

10.24 am

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): I think that I speak on behalf of all Northern Ireland Members present when I say that this is not a single narrow defence of grammar schools, but a campaign for the whole education system in Northern Ireland. If I can catch the eye of the Chairman of the Northern Ireland Grand Committee next week, I will raise the subject again when we consider the total budget spend for Northern Ireland, because we are suffering badly from expenditure-related problems across the primary, secondary, university and further education sectors.

I want to take up a point made by the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey)—she is not right honourable but she should have been made so a long time ago—about the influence in the Department of Education in Northern Ireland of a small number of people. That is seriously important. The Minister should step back a little and identify the civil servants and the number of representatives of academia in Northern Ireland who have been carrying out a campaign since they gave up their kaftans and sandals in the 1960s and 1970s, when they were outwardly left-wing socialists. That is all they are. They campaigned at that time to undermine the education system in England and Wales, and were successful in destroying it. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) said, they lowered academic standards in England and Wales.

Standards in Northern Ireland were higher because we had a widespread, selective, fair and equal education system. There are people in the Minister's Department, and some of the advisers who were involved in the Burns report and the Costello report, who are, frankly, left-wing retreads. The quality of their academic research is not objective, quantitative or qualitative, and is highly questionable.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Barry Gardiner): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

David Burnside: I will in a moment. I am not attacking the integrity of any civil servant in his Department, but there are academics such as Professor Gallagher who submit academic reports that are, in my opinion, highly questionable. I have raised that with the academic authorities at Queen's university in Belfast through the normal channels. The Minister should step back a little and realise that there is a conspiracy in his Department and some sections of academia in Northern Ireland—totally separate from the mainstream opinion of society—to destroy our grammar schools.

Mr. Gardiner: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene on him, although I did not wish to have to raise such a point. I am very happy for hon. Members and others to criticise me and my decisions in my capacity as the Minister responsible for education in Northern Ireland. However, I do not think that it is either fit or decent for hon. Members in this Chamber to criticise my civil servants in the Department of Education in the manner that we have just heard, and on other occasions, when they know perfectly well that it is not possible for those civil servants to respond. If there are proper criticisms to be made of the policy in Northern Ireland, hon. Members should make them to me and I will respond. They should not make them ad hominem to those who cannot respond.

David Burnside: I address the accusations to the Minister. I ask him to trace the record of his ministerial position and responsibilities in the Department back to the time of the Assembly, and to consider the bias in the composition of the Costello committee. It was not representative of the academic world, and could not have come to any conclusion other than to be against academic selection. If one considers the background pronouncements, submissions and public statements of those appointed to the committee, one realises that the committee was biased, and that was because of the recommendations from officials in the Minister's Department who are against academic selection. I have made my point strongly, and accept the Minister's defence of his civil servants. I would never attack the integrity of civil servants, who have to do their jobs and who, in Northern Ireland overall, do so excellently. However, there is a bias on subject matter in his Department that needs to be questioned.

In the short time available I turn to one other point that has not been raised so far in this important debate. The Minister should look at the slide presentations that were made during the worst days of the troubles by the Industrial Development Board—now Invest Northern Ireland—at Berkeley street, or in New York or Taiwan, in an effort to get investment into Northern Ireland. Companies said that they did not want to be near Northern Ireland—hopefully, we are past those very bad days, and businesses are investing and will continue to invest in Northern Ireland—but the one thing above all that we were able to sell, despite the troubles and our bad image, was the quality of our education system. The Minister is proposing that we lower the quality of that system, and that will be bad for investment.

When an inward investor comes to Northern Ireland, he looks at the return on the investment, the profitability of the enterprise, the amount of support that he can get, and for an environment in which people can enjoy living and working. He also looks at the quality and availability of an educated work force, and the proposals will damage that. That has not been raised so far and I should like the Minister to take it into account. We need investment in Northern Ireland. Let us not destroy what is good in our academic system. Let us improve primary, secondary and the grammar school system, not destroy it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The rule is lifted.

10.30 am

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): The course of this debate seems as predictable as everything else that happens in Northern Ireland politics. I now find myself starting at half-past 10.

First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) on securing the debate. As one who still looks in on Northern Ireland politics as an outsider I found it fascinating. His presentation was exceptionally measured, well reasoned and detailed. Those are not accusations that I would normally level at him, so he can take the praise on this occasion as being absolutely genuine. One remark struck me in particular. He said that we were dealing with an ideologically driven measure. Coming from this new Labour Government, I find that quite refreshing. I may not necessarily agree with the measure, but it makes a pleasant change.

I can bring something of a different perspective to the debate. Unlike the Northern Ireland Members who have all gone through a grammar school, selection-based system, and unlike the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) and the new Labour Minister, I had a comprehensive education. A quick look at Vacher Dod tells me about the other two Members. For the benefit of the hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs), the new Minister represents Brent, North, not Brent, East. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) is rather shorter and has rather less facial hair than the hon. Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner).

It was an excellent education and I want to consider for a few seconds why that was. It has a bearing on the debate. I want to try to widen the context of our considerations this morning. First, I got an excellent education because my school was very much part of my community. There was a strong sense of community. That is also true of Northern Ireland. I sometimes think that if Northern Ireland had a slightly weaker sense of community it might find it rather easier to regulate its affairs, but I say that simply in passing.

I also got an excellent education because I attended a school where there were good, well motivated teaching staff who maintained excellent discipline and because the resources that were given to the school were adequate for the job that was required of it. We always want more resources, especially in an area like education. My experience is that the institutional structure in which we educate our children is often less important than the strength of the community, the integration of the school in the community and the way in which the teaching staff are resourced, the children are disciplined and the school functions as part of that community.

My sisters and I are the first generation of my family to go to higher education and to obtain degrees. I come from, to borrow an expression from the hon. Member for Lagan Valley, a working-class Protestant family. My father was a shepherd. I attended school with the children of doctors and teachers. It is no accident that we are the first generation to attend higher education. I do not think that this was a generation in which the Carmichaels just happened to get smart. We are the product of a generation given opportunities by a comprehensive education system that were denied to previous generations.

I do not say that Northern Ireland should necessarily throw the baby out with the bathwater and go down the same route, because there are few more dangerous things in this place than people considering their experience on this side of the Irish sea—or the north channel in my situation—and then trying to transfer it lock, stock and barrel to the situation in Northern Ireland. However, I say to Northern Ireland Members that they should be measured in their criticism of comprehensive education—there is a lot of good to be had in it, and it is not the end of civilisation as they might know it.

Lady Hermon: I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said. He is a strong devolutionist, and, fortunately for him, the Scottish Parliament is in place. Does he therefore agree with Northern Ireland Members who have contributed to the debate through interventions or speeches that this decision—a crucial and fundamental decision to change the method of education and selection for generations to come—should be left to the devolved Assembly, rather than being taken by a Labour Minister who is unaccountable to the people of Northern Ireland?

[Lady Hermon]

Mr. Carmichael: The hon. Lady has served on sufficient Committees, and has heard me often enough on the Floor of the House, to know that that is exactly my view. I share many of the concerns that have been expressed by Northern Ireland Members this morning, including that relating to the manner in which the matter has been handled by the Government. We live in an age in which we are consulted to the point of extinction, but never listened to. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] This seems to be one of the worst examples of that. I caution the Minister that if he proceeds in this manner and with this determination, he will risk doing damage to more than an education system. He stands to bring the entire political system into disrepute, because if there is such a gulf of opinion between the Government and the governed, be it on education or on any other matter, the process of disengagement from formal parliamentary and party politics will only get worse.

Had I been the Member choosing the subject for debate today, and had I been minded to bring forward a discussion on education, I would have been more inclined to focus on the need for integrated education in Northern Ireland because, in my view, that is the absolute priority. However, we are where we are, and I make that point only for the purpose of putting it on the record.

I was struck by some of the proposals made by the hon. Member for Lagan Valley with regard to reform of the system and the abolition or reform of the 11-plus. I thought that there was a great deal of merit in those proposals. One thing that has struck me both during my research for this debate and in the course of the debate itself is that the new ideas all seem to be coming from one direction. All that we get from the other direction—from the Government—is the question of abolition. They say that it is comprehensive or nothing. It seems to me that there is much scope in the current system for greater flexibility—perhaps for making 14 rather than 11 the cut-off. If such a range and quality of ideas is coming from the Democratic Unionist party, the Ulster Unionist party and the Alliance party, why is that not the fulcrum of the debate?

I see that I have taken up nine minutes of the debate; I had not intended to speak for as long as that. I conclude by saying that the Minister ignores the consensus on this issue at his peril.

10.39 am

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): First, may I congratulate the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) on securing the debate? It is a subject that, in my journeys to Northern Ireland, I have found to be of huge interest and concern to parents and teachers from all backgrounds and communities.

We have heard today from representatives of both Unionist parties, and I should put it on record that yesterday morning I had a meeting in County Tyrone with Monsignor Denis Faul and representatives from the Catholic grammar schools, who wanted to make clear their outright opposition to the Government's proposals. This is not an issue that divides people along sectarian lines.

I am glad too that we were able to get a slight moderation from the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) of his party's customary hostility to academic selection in all its forms—a hostility that the Liberal Democrats have expressed often in speeches and votes in both the House of Commons and local authorities in England and Wales in recent years.

Today's debate has centred on the Government's proposal to end academic selection from 2008. As we have heard from the hon. Members for Lagan Valley and for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs), there is no evidence that that will improve academic attainment within Northern Ireland. In fact, the English evidence suggests that the opposite is likely. What we see in Northern Ireland is better results in public examinations than in Great Britain and a better record of enabling pupils from all backgrounds to get into higher education. Would that Great Britain could match the standards currently achieved in Northern Ireland.

Everybody accepts that there has to be a mechanism of some sort for determining admissions to schools that are oversubscribed. The Government's consultation document makes it clear that they are looking at two basic options. The first is random selection—some form of lottery with a Minister or one of his officials saying metaphorically to parents, "It could be you". I can think of nothing that is more likely to provoke confusion and uncertainty among parents, who want to have a clear idea of where their children are likely to go to school.

The second option, which is more likely to happen if the proposals become law, is that the distance between home and school will in practice decide where a child should be educated at secondary level. After all, that is what happens in most of England. If that happens, it will place at a particular disadvantage parents and children from rural areas who will almost by definition be further away from schools, which for the most part will be in towns. As the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) said, the Government's model will also place at a disadvantage children living in poor, working-class areas, who will be more likely to be trapped in a neighbourhood comprehensive in the same way as they are trapped in so many inner cities in England and Wales at the moment.

I want to say a quick word about the proposals in the Government document on pupil entitlement, because it has not been mentioned much. The minimum figure of 24 courses for GCSE and 27 for A-level is somewhat arbitrary. We are all in favour of a broad-based curriculum, but to impose such a rigid total is likely to mean one of two things: either split-site schools, perhaps the worst mistake of 1960s educational reform with children being bussed around from one site to another, or an accelerated programme for the closure of small schools, particularly in rural areas, with pupils herded together in large comprehensives. One thing that we know from the English experience and international evidence is that disciplinary and pastoral problems are much more difficult to manage in large secondary schools than in schools with fewer pupils.

There is a better way, and I want to make it absolutely clear that if, as I hope, a Conservative Government are elected this year, my party would abandon this misguided policy immediately. The hon. Member for Lagan Valley made it clear that many constructive approaches can be taken to address the problems that exist with schooling in Northern Ireland. Certainly, we should consider international evidence and build on the idea of the pupil profile to create an alternative mechanism for academic selection to that of the 11-plus exam. We should focus on how to improve schools that are not working well, and in Northern Ireland, as in Great Britain, we should work to establish those high-quality technical and vocational routes through secondary education that Rab Butler saw as essential way back in 1944, but which the United Kingdom has never managed to operate successfully in the decades since then.

I want to give the Minister time to respond, so I shall make my final point. I have always found him to be a genial and pleasant parliamentary colleague and opponent, but I believe he has been sent to the debate today to defend a cowardly, mendacious policy that will be destructive to the life chances of thousands of children throughout Northern Ireland. It is cowardly because the Minister and the Government know that every test of public opinion in Northern Ireland shows a decisive majority opposed to what the Government want to do. The response booklet, which was published with the Government's consultation document, shows that parents were not even asked directly to express an opinion on whether they support the end of academic selection. That amounts to trying to cheat the people of Northern Ireland of a clear say over the future of the education system in the Province.

Despite the language and the promises about the proposals being designed to improve children's education, they are driven by another motive: ideological prejudice. The central proposal, which is to dismantle that part of the Northern Ireland system that works best, is both paradoxical and a flagrantly destructive way to go about education reform.

I hope that the Minister will listen to the debate and to the views of people in Northern Ireland and that even at this late stage the Government will show that they are willing to think again.

10.47 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Barry Gardiner): I will speak fast; I will take no interventions—solely because in the time available I want to try to answer the many questions that have already been raised.

I welcome the opportunity to address the points made by the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson). I was astonished by some of the remarks made by the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington). He must forgive us for wondering whether he read anything but extracts from the document, as he cited only the two criteria suggested as possible tie-breakers—after all the other criteria had been exhausted—as the most likely means that would be adopted for admitting children to post-primary schools in Northern Ireland. That is less than worthy.

Hon. Members will know that on 28 January I published for consultation options for admissions arrangements to post-primary schools in Northern Ireland. As we are in consultation, I am in listening mode; it would not, therefore, be appropriate for me to pre-judge the consultation process, but I want it to be based on facts, not on the rumours or speculation that are regularly reported. The consultation is not about re-running the old arguments about whether the transfer tests should end; it is a consultation on how we should proceed after 2008, when the transfer tests have gone.

While responding to the points raised in the debate, I should like to take this opportunity to lay the facts before the Chamber. I assure hon. Members that their views will be taken into account along with the other responses to the issues covered by the consultation. I intend to publish a summary of the consultation responses after they have all been received and analysed.

Today, and over the past weeks and months, I have heard much about schools, and how the new admissions arrangements may affect successful schools. I am no different from any other hon. Member present in that I greatly value good schools, and I respect and admire the work of their teachers and other staff. However, my focus is not and should not be on schools; it is and must be on children. My focus is not the school's success but the child's. What matters is not a school's position in a league table, but that more children are achieving better results and realising their potential.

The hon. Member for Lagan Valley will be aware that, even in his own constituency, there are wide variations. In some schools almost all pupils achieve five or more GCSEs at grades A* to C, but in others, the figure is below 20 per cent. and even as low as single figures. I cannot believe that he is therefore satisfied that the present arrangements are serving all pupils in his constituency equally well and that they are being given the best opportunities to realise their potential.

Even before the consultation was published, there was a great deal of public comment, widely reported in the media, about the proposed new post-primary arrangements. Many have said that they want an education system that gives every child a good education regardless of their social background, the area in which they live or their wealth. Many have said that we need a system that opens up opportunities for every child rather than closing them down, gives all children an opportunity to realise their potential, and leaves them with a positive attitude to education that will have a lasting effect. Likewise, many have said that we need a system that recognises the value of different types of learning, including academic, vocational and work-related learning. We need a flexible, realistic and relevant curriculum that recognises and rewards those different types of learning and provides clear progression routes for all young people, whether it is into further or higher education or the workplace.

I cannot stress too strongly that I agree wholeheartedly with all of those remarks; they are exactly what we are trying to achieve, and I believe that the new arrangements for post-primary education will provide all of those things. However, there appear to be misconceptions, confusion and uncertainty about the new arrangements, so let me clarify what the new arrangements are not about.

First, let me say, as I have said many times before, that the new arrangements for post-primary education are not about abolishing grammar schools. There is a clear demand for an academic style of education, as evidenced in the responses to the Burns consultation and in correspondence that I have received. Grammar schools have a key role in the new arrangements and will continue to provide that style of education. However, like all good schools, they are about much more than whom they admit. Parents consider them to be good schools because of the curriculum that they offer, the pace of teaching and learning, the facilities and range of opportunities available, the quality of teaching, the leadership, the tradition and the sense of community. Changing the admissions process will not change those aspects of a school or the value that a school can add to the education of their pupils.

[Mr. Barry Gardiner]

Secondly, the new arrangements are not about imposing a "one size fits all" approach. I want all pupils to have access to the entitlement framework and to a wide menu of general and applied courses. Schools will decide how to do that—working with other schools and the further education sector—and what the precise mix of courses will be. Those arrangements will be developed at local level to respond to local needs. That is hardly a centrally imposed, "one size fits all" approach, as has been suggested.

Thirdly, the new arrangements are not about introducing a comprehensive system. We all recognise that pupils have a range of different educational needs. I want there to be a range of school types, each offering a distinctive approach. I want all schools to develop their curricular strengths, to become centres of excellence and to share their expertise and experience with their neighbours. Parents and pupils will choose the approach and the courses that best meet the child's educational needs and his or her interests, aptitudes and aspirations—

Lady Hermon: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance, because I had understood that we were having an Adjournment debate about admissions arrangements for post-primary schools in Northern Ireland. Is it acceptable that the Minister will not take a single intervention in what is supposed to be a debate on a very important issue?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have been lenient with the range of the debate already. The Minister must be allowed to respond to the many points that have been made in whatever way he sees fit.

Mr. Gardiner: Parents and pupils will choose the approach and the courses that best meet the child's educational needs and his or her interests, aptitudes and aspirations, rather than trying to shoe-horn them into either an academic or non-academic pathway.

If those are not the features of the new system, what are? The new arrangements will focus on the child. Each child is unique. They have different learning needs; they mature at different rates and their interests can change over time. The system must be able to recognise and respond to those needs.

Kate Hoey: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister simply to be reading from a prepared speech that is not reflecting what has been said in the debate? It is rather patronising, because it implies that we know nothing about education in Northern Ireland. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must point out that, had I been of the opinion that the Minister was out of order, I would have drawn him to order. I resent people questioning my judgment.

Mr. Gardiner: The new post-primary arrangements will raise standards for all by building on the strengths of the current system while addressing the weaknesses; by providing flexibility and choice in schools and courses, enabling young people to keep options open; by engaging and motivating young people, recognising and rewarding their achievements at different levels and in different types of education; and by giving all young people an education that is relevant to the needs of the economy and society in the 21st century.

Today's debate focuses on how children will transfer from primary to post-primary schools. The Costello working group concluded that no form of academic selection would remove the high-stakes, high-stress element and that academic selection at age 11 is itself educationally unsound, as that age is too young to commit pupils to particular educational pathways.

Mr. Trimble: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not wish to challenge your judgment; I seek your advice. Several hon. Members have spoken in the debate. Would it be possible for you to find some way in which to encourage the Minister to respond to specific points that hon. Members have made rather than make a generalised speech? His speech is in and about the subject matter, but it does not deal with specific points that hon. Members have made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hear what the right hon. Gentleman says, but I remind the Chamber that the Minister must respond to a debate of about an hour and 15 minutes in something like 13 minutes. In my view, that is a Gargantuan task and, if certain points are not covered in his treatise, I am fairly sure that the permanent secretary, who is also present in the Chamber, will be engaging in correspondence on the Minister's behalf.

Mr. Gardiner: It is clear that hon. Members want to take up as much time as possible in the debate with points of order, so that I cannot answer their questions.

As hon. Members will know, in January 2004 the Government accepted the recommendation that future transfer arrangements should be made on the basis of informed parental choice—parents making informed decisions about the school preferences that they should express on the transfer form. I believe that it is the right and responsibility of parents to make the decision about the most appropriate schooling for their child. I trust parents to make that choice. The hon. Member for Lagan Valley and those who agree with him must explain why they think that they know so much better than the child's own parents.

Let me be clear. I know that sometimes parents will get things wrong, too. They are capable of deluding themselves about their child's talents and capabilities, but no one cares more about getting that individual decision right than the parent. Parents are not infallible any more than educationalists are, but they have the right to make mistakes for their child. Other people do not. We expect doctors to recommend a course of treatment for a child, but we would not allow a doctor to enforce a decision against the will of the parents. Why should it be different in education?

Advocates of academic selection have suggested that there are suitable alternative methods of selection; they have done so today. However, Northern Ireland has never been satisfied with its various systems of academic selection. That has been a feature of the education system for more than 50 years and, during that time, it has gone through several changes, each time in search of a better system. But the problems still exist. Methods used have included different types of tests as well as combinations of tests and forms of teacher assessment, all of which were found wanting. None of the suggestions that I have heard recently differs significantly from those already tried, tested and rejected.

The key word in the phrase "informed parental choice" is "informed". So how will parents be informed? The pupil profile will be central to that process. It will provide parents with clear and objective information about their child's progress, achievements, interests and aspirations. It is being piloted extensively by the Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment to ensure that teachers are satisfied that it is manageable and usable—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Carmichael: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am very grateful to you for taking this point of order. At the commencement of his speech, the Minister said that he would not take interventions because a lot of points to which he was required to reply were raised during the debate. It was apparent to me, even from this distance, that the Minister was speaking from a typewritten text. Presumably, points raised during the debate will have been added to the manuscript. Would it be in order for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to require the Minister to place a copy of the speech from which he has just been reading in the Library, so that we may see it and make our own judgment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order. Furthermore, the hon. Gentleman is taking time from the next debate.

Rural Bus Services (Norfolk)

11.1 am

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): The House will know that local bus services in counties such as Norfolk are vital to many people. A large number of people without access to private transport rely on those services. For example, local buses bring 500,000 people into King's Lynn town centre and that excludes those buses that bring in students to the local educational colleges and schools. Bus passengers contribute £12.5 million to the retail economy, and that shows the importance of bus services to King's Lynn.

The days of Eastern Counties' double-decker buses plying routes around Norfolk two-thirds or three-quarters empty are over. There is now a new breed of bus company in Norfolk. Most are privately owned, flexible, highly focused, well managed and with highly motivated work forces. One such example is Norfolk Green, based in King's Lynn in my constituency. Its managing director is Ben Colson, who has a huge amount of experience in the industry. His company, founded in 1992, runs 39 buses with an average age of 7.5 years, slightly ahead of the industry average. Its buses cover roughly 4 million km a year, operate on 850 miles of mostly unclassified rural roads with variable maintenance and carry 1.2 million passenger journeys a year. The company employs 75 people, most of whom are on flexible working arrangements to fit their needs, and the buses put a substantial amount of money into the local economy. Norfolk Green is typical of the new generation of bus companies in Norfolk and East Anglia.

However, life for the medium-sized rural and urban bus operator is becoming more and more difficult and challenging. First, traffic congestion is unquestionably getting worse and worse; it is costing the UK economy £25 billion a year. Scaled down by population alone, that represents an additional cost of £1.8 million for King's Lynn. In fact, King's Lynn is more congested than average; peak-hour journey speed on London road is about 3 mph, lower than that of central London before congestion charging. The real cost of congestion in King's Lynn is probably more than £3 million a year.

Modern buses cost roughly £30 an hour, or £1 for every two minutes, to operate. In the King's Lynn area, that is slightly more than the average fare paid; every two minutes of extra time on the timetable because of congestion means that bus companies have to carry one extra passenger. Bus industry costs are rising at roughly 9 per cent. a year. The main culprits are employer and public liability insurance premiums and fleet insurance premiums. In addition, there has been a very big increase in regulatory pressures, which I shall come to in a moment.

First, I should like to say a word or two about the situation in King's Lynn and West Norfolk. We are seeing a number of planning decisions that have consistently tilted the balance in favour of car use. Recently, we have had a number of developments of out-of-town and edge-of-town shopping stores. All of them are geared entirely to the car user, and unfortunately we do not yet have a park-and-ride scheme in King's Lynn.

[Mr. Henry Bellingham]

Furthermore, roadworks in King's Lynn never appear to be properly co-ordinated; I hope that my local borough and county councils will get to grips with that. I can understand why the environmental health department is keen that work does not continue after 6 o'clock, because of intrusive noise to residents. However, at one stage last summer, there was resurfacing on Gaywood road and work at the South Gate scheme, the Loke road junction and the Anglia Canners access junction, and the result was almost total gridlock in King's Lynn. There was a total lack of co-ordination between the borough council and the county council; I hope they will address that.

I turn to some national regulatory issues that affect the industry and the bus operators in our Norfolk constituencies. For the period between 2004 and 2007–08, there is a swathe of significant new transport-specific EU directives. Some of them are perfectly acceptable—especially those that will improve health and safety and those that are aimed at helping the disabled—and taken individually they might not be crippling. However, there is a concern that their total cumulative weight will bear down on companies and destroy wealth and, possibly, jobs as well.

Let us look at the cost of some of these directives. First, there is an EU directive to change weekly driver rest periods, which is expected later this year. That will take away flexibility in the way that drivers can be rostered to work, and it will have the effect of reducing bus services on Saturdays. That could have a significant impact on teenagers and other youngsters who want to have access to various leisure services and facilities in Norfolk. The additional cost to Norfolk Green's operation, if it does not abandon or reduce service levels, will be approximately £60,000 a year.

The EU new recording devices directive replaces paper recording with an EU-wide digital recording device scheme. The capital costs of that to Norfolk Green will be £40,000 over five years, plus half a clerk to administer the scheme. It will bring no improvement in safety; it is merely an EU-wide measure for conformity.

The EU directive on the financial standing requirements will come into force in January next year. It requires each operator to have financial headroom in their bank accounts; that sum will be set in relation to the size of their fleet. It also requires non-euro states to reset that sum every five years by reference to the euro. That means that Norfolk Green must have an extra £102,000 in its bank account. That is a significant sum. The one-off cost to Norfolk Green will be £10,000 a year.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): Everything that my hon. Friend has said so far applies in my constituency. To reinforce the point he is making, can I draw attention to a constituent of mine? Mr. David Pursey is the managing director of Anglian Bus and Coach Ltd., which operates in both Norfolk and Suffolk. He has said that to get licensed in 24 hours' time, he has to prove to the traffic commissioner that he has £162,000 of headroom in the bank. That has meant that he has had to refinance his bus fleet. He and other bus operators are not against having financial stability and probity, but this will eventually put many bus companies out of business, which will be detrimental to our constituents.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend reinforces the point. He mentions the extra financial headroom that is required of that bus company, and it is a slightly larger sum than the £102,000 that Norfolk Green will need.

It is one thing if directives are properly consulted on, but the change to operators' licences that will be introduced in 2006 was not consulted on. Currently, operators can opt for either a national or an EU-wide fleet operation status. I gather that, as part of implementing the directive, the UK Government, for their own administrative convenience, amalgamated the two tiers into one at the higher international cost level. The cost to Norfolk Green in this case will be £31,000 a year. I ask the Minister: did the UK Government have any choice in that matter? Could they have implemented at the lower, national level, or were they obliged by the EU directive to go for the higher international cost level?

We then have the EU directive on driver retraining, which requires all bus drivers to receive a minimum number of days' retraining per annum, regardless of their individual standards, professionalism and experience over previous years. Norfolk Green said to me that if it cannot source the extra drivers—there is a local and national shortage—bus services will have to be cut. The additional cost to Norfolk Green would be £20,000 a year.

Then there is the EU draft directive on driver age; there is no start date yet. That will increase the minimum age for bus drivers from 21 to 24, thereby reducing career prospects and attractiveness in the industry, which is a pity. The additional costs resulting from that will depend on the age mix of staff at the introduction of the directive, but there will certainly be an extra cost to industry. Will we, as a country, have any flexibility to perhaps get a derogation from that directive?

I want to mention the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which is mainly a UK piece of legislation, and which most people support. My concern, in terms of the road transport industry, is that under the Act there is a reasonableness test for buildings and other built structures, and particularly for houses, but there is an absolute requirement for the road transport directive to be implemented. The regulatory impact assessment carried out by the Department showed that a financially positive change would result for urban bus services, but not for rural bus services. Norfolk Green, for example, will have to spend a lot of money replacing vehicles over the next 10 years. The new compliant vehicles will cost roughly £75,000, whereas the modern non-compliant ones cost £50,000. The compliant vehicles are wider, lower and cannot always access some very small rural lanes, thereby leading possibly to less access for some communities.

There will be a substantial additional cost to Norfolk Green as a result of the DDA—roughly £57,000 a year. However, that is a measure that will benefit bus users in Norfolk, and we welcome it. The problem is that all these other EU directives will be a cost and a drag on the business, and will reduce the money available for investment.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): My hon. Friend has been listing a whole litany of regulations, most of which, with the honourable exception of the Disability Discrimination Act, seem to be making things worse rather than better. Does he agree that there are some very simple things that bus companies and local authorities could do to make things better? For example, constituents of mine found out by accident of a late-night bus service, run by Simonds bus company, from Norwich to my constituency. When I asked the county council whether the timetable could be made available on every single bus, they said that timetables were distributed through parish contacts, libraries and so on. Does my hon. Friend agree that a simple rule that the timetable for a bus must always be available and displayed on the bus would do a whole lot more good for consumers than many of the regulations that he has been talking about?

Mr. Bellingham: I agree. That is a common-sense suggestion from my hon. Friend, and I can tell him that most of the bus companies in my constituency have gone down that path, and that is to be welcomed. Obviously, in this climate of extra regulation, most bus companies will bend over backwards to try to make life easier for the travelling public.

The last directive that is of great concern is the road transport directive, which is coming in on 23 March. I gather that we will hear more details about that from the Department imminently. The UK had an individual opt-out from the original EU working time directive. That came in under health and safety; it was not under the social chapter. The working time directive restricts the working week for particular employees to 48 hours. As I understand it, the road transport directive came in under what is called a horizontal amending directive procedure. That overrules the original working time directive, and there is no UK individual opt-out. It will substantially increase the cost to many of our bus companies. A similar directive has been applied to junior doctors' hours and it costs the NHS a great deal of money. This provision will cost the rural and urban bus companies a substantial amount of money. I will explain why in a moment. It will add about £45,000 to Norfolk Green's costs. The total costs of all the extra regulations will be £236,000 a year for Norfolk Green. That is a substantial sum to a medium-sized company.

On top of those EU directives there are all the other burdens that are being put on business at the moment. Only last week, the British Chambers of Commerce estimated that the total cost of the extra burdens that have been imposed on business since the previous election is now £40 billion a year. That includes all the extra employment and social costs, in addition to the road transport-specific directives and costs.

Mr. Anthony D. Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this debate. Does he not accept that part of the burden that we now face was created in the early '80s, when deregulation of the bus services occurred? In my constituency, we had Eastern Counties running a good rural service from Great Yarmouth to King's Lynn, Norwich and other parts. We also had our own bus undertaking—the blue bus undertaking—which was regarded as one of the best in the region.

The bus service that we had in those early days was decimated. The burden is now on the residents of Norfolk, who are suffering through lack of services in many areas. The rural bus subsidy grant is trying to assist by giving more services to remote areas, such as parts of both my constituency and the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that take on the overall situation. Some of his points are valid, but I would point out that small independent operators in my constituency are running services from Spalding to King's Lynn and on to Cromer, and from Cambridge to Wisbech to King's Lynn and on to Cromer. Many of the smaller villages are involved. For example, there is a service from King's Lynn to Gayton to Great Massingham to Harpley. Many of those services had lapsed under the old regime. There was the regular sight of large Eastern Counties double-decker buses going round Norfolk's lanes, most of them three quarters or half empty. It was not an economic way of operating. We now have many more flexible operators providing services. They are doing their level best in a difficult regulatory environment.

I want to say a few more words about the road transport directive. It was aimed mainly at long-distance drivers. Obviously, they come under more stress. It is much more monotonous to drive down a motorway. Someone driving a lorry or a bus on a long journey comes under more stress and there is a greater likelihood of their getting tired. Someone driving in an urban or rural environment and going over shorter distances faces much less stress. That is why the EU brought in an exemption under the road transport directive for journeys of less than 50 km. As I understand it, having talked to various experts from the industry, the idea was to exempt urban and bus companies. That is obviously sensible, because such journeys are shorter and should not be subject to the directive. However, many of Norfolk Green's routes are more than 50 km long.

I know that the Minister is having meetings with the Confederation of Passenger Transport UK. The industry is rightly pressing for that limit of 50 km to be raised to 80 km. That would solve many of the problems. We are not asking for drivers to be made to work longer hours or for them to take risks on health and safety. I understand, however, that several Norfolk bus companies are having difficult discussions with drivers, who are worried that they will lose substantial sums under the directive. They may well be considering alternative employment, where there are obviously other opportunities. That cannot be good for the industry.

As we want the Minister to have at least 10 minutes for the winding-up speech, I will conclude. The Government must carefully consider whether, through discussions with their EU colleagues and with the Commission, that 50 km limit can be raised to 80 km. Can the Minister say anything about the other directives, where there may be some scope for flexibility? Can she tell us anything about the overall picture for the future of rural bus services? As I mentioned, we have a significant number of dynamic companies serving our constituents in Norfolk. They are exceptionally focused and efficient companies with highly motivated work forces, but the overall burden of regulation on business has now reached the stage where they will have to take difficult decisions and probably reduce the number of services. That will be to the detriment of our constituents, so I hope that the Minister will be able to answer some of those points and give us some cause and hope for optimism.

[Mr. Bellingham]

11.20 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) on securing this important debate.

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of congestion in King's Lynn, particularly focusing on the lack of co-ordination of roadworks. He will be delighted to know that the Traffic Management Act 2004 will help considerably in ensuring such co-ordination. As he will know, local authorities will have the power to fine, for instance, utility companies for digging up the road and overstaying their welcome. We are currently looking at the implementation of that Act, and it should help a lot.

Another congestion issue is bus priority measures, which many local authorities have introduced via their local transport plans to great effect. I urge the hon. Gentleman's local councils to consider them. He also mentioned the impact of planning decisions that are geared to the car user. His local authorities should consider a park-and-ride scheme for King's Lynn, as I understand that one does not exist at the moment, to ensure that people park their cars outside and then take the bus into town.

Many of the details about the EC directives could be best dealt with by correspondence. For instance, the road transport directive to which the hon. Gentleman referred does not apply to local journeys under 50 km. If he really is concerned about raising the level to 80 km, I would be interested to hear from Norfolk Green, or any other local bus operator, and the confederation about how that would affect rural bus services. We do not want to create any obstacles for rural bus services, but I am concerned that he doubts whether we should be pushing for driver retraining. In my experience of using buses in rural areas and that of my constituents, driver training is vital. A bus user's confidence is reliant on the driver's attitude. For a passenger who happens to be disabled, whether or not that involves using a wheelchair, driver response is vital. I do not know exactly what the hon. Gentleman's concerns are about that directive, but I would not like any reduction in the focus on retraining.

Mr. Bellingham: Yes, but the point is that some drivers are very experienced and extremely proficient. I know that a number of the drivers in my constituency were recruited from the armed forces, where they had experience driving heavy vehicles, and after some years in the commercial sector they have a huge amount of experience. My point was that surely it should be up to the company to decide whether they need retraining, rather than being mandated by a EU directive.

Charlotte Atkins: Possibly that is the case, but we are dealing not necessarily with a good local firm such as Norfolk Green, but with the general situation. I have heard stories that I would not like to repeat here about particular drivers in particular companies who desperately need training.

On the point about the shortage of drivers, I believe that many companies are doing innovative work in, first, creating more flexible working for drivers to make the job more attractive and, secondly, recruiting drivers who are already trained from Poland, the Czech Republic and other such places. On the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, I would not want to tell my rural constituents that they should receive less of a service in terms of disability access than their urban neighbours, so I would be very concerned about reducing the level of responsibility.

The hon. Gentleman talked about access to lanes. As I shall say later in my speech, many rural services now offer flexible, demand-responsive buses, which tend to be the smaller vehicles. The Government have significantly improved the funding arrangements for rural bus services, and Norfolk in particular has benefited. During the past seven years from 1998, nearly £450 million has been allocated specifically for the support of rural bus services, mainly through the rural bus subsidy grant, providing some 2,200 new or improved bus services. Norfolk has had the highest allocation of RBSG of any local authority in the country—£2.4 million this year alone, rising to £2.5 million in 2005–06. That is a large sum by any stretch of the imagination.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) referred to deregulation. Sure enough, far from being a golden age of rural bus services, under deregulation such services were heavily reduced. We are bringing back a range of subsidies to ensure that rural residents receive the same sort of service as urban residents.

Mr. Anthony D. Wright: On the point that people deserve an equal service, does my hon. Friend accept that there are people in many rural areas, such as parts of my constituency in the northern parishes, who still suffer from a lack of service? I understand that there probably are not enough passengers to fill a bus, but such people should still be able to travel backwards and forwards to and from work by public transport if required.

Charlotte Atkins: Absolutely, because many rural households do not have access to a car.

Norfolk has been allocated a total of £16.5 million since 1998 under the rural bus subsidy grant. That supports some 70 rural bus services in the county and more than 1.6 million passenger journeys, which is a good start. Increasingly, those services are flexible, so that they can be used by a range of people who do not necessarily want to use a scheduled bus service. Recent examples of the services set up by RBSG funding include a feeder bus from villages in west Norfolk into the Cromer-King's Lynn service, and a flexibus service in the Acle area, which links into a half-hourly Peterborough, Norwich, Great Yarmouth and Lowestoft service. The RBSG also supports a bus service originally set up by five parishes in South Norfolk using parish transport grants. That is another way in which local people can help to ensure that their services remain helpful to the local community.

The use of demand-responsive transport and feeder services forms part of many of the developments that we are introducing in rural bus services. Norfolk has 16 demand-responsive services, and an increasing number of such services are being developed to take advantage of the relaxed rules that the Department has introduced. That means that subsidies can be obtained for flexibly routed services. Already, 100 such services have been registered since the change was introduced last year. That is important because in rural areas it is not always feasible to have a scheduled bus going every hour throughout the day. It is important to have a feeder service. An example is the feeder car service in the Great Massingham area. So we can be proud of many things happening in Norfolk. Norfolk Green will benefit from many Government subsidies—subsidies that did not exist before 1997. I am proud of our record on rural buses. My own constituency includes a large rural area, and we have much to be proud of in what we have been doing. I have not been able to go through the details—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order.

11.30 am

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

Broadcasting (North-west)

2 pm

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): I am pleased to have secured this debate. As I shall illustrate, its full title—broadcasting in the north-west—covers a multitude of sins. I am particularly pleased that my right hon. Friend the Minister is here to answer on behalf of the Government. He has his serried ranks of advisers with him, as well as his redoubtable Parliamentary Private Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman), who, as a Merseyside MP himself, will have mixed feelings and be acutely aware of the imbalance in the north-west.

Once the debate was secured, Mr. Cook—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. I have no wish to disturb the hon. Gentleman's flow, so I should mention something early. He will see from the front of my Bench that the decision was taken by the House, in its wisdom or otherwise, that the four senior members of the Chairmen's Panel who occupy this Chair should be addressed as Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Kilfoyle: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I know that familiarity breeds contempt and I would not like to earn your contempt at this time and place.

When the subject was announced, it provoked interest from the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) contacted me, as did Ofcom and the BBC. However, I was not contacted, other than en passant by a Westminster correspondent, by ITV, which was illustrative of its attitude towards what goes on in this place—more of that later. My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) and I also contacted our television expert in the person of Mr. Phil Redmond of Mersey Television.

Let me put on the record how great and diverse an amount of television talent, in all its many manifestations, there is on Merseyside. As I mentioned, Phil Redmond is an outstandingly successfully producer; we have award-winning writers such as Jimmy McGovern, Willy Russell, Alan Bleasdale and Frank Cottrell Boyce, as well as a galaxy of stars who learned their performing skills on Merseyside. In short, we have a massive pool of creative talent in the city and the sub-region. It is partly out of concern for their professional well-being and to ensure that they have the opportunity to increase and promote the offerings that they make to the world of television and general broadcasting that we are here today. I should also say that in BBC Radio Merseyside we have one of the most widely listened to radio stations in the country. The north-west is a vibrant centre of broadcasting.

I applied for this debate in the aftermath of the BBC announcement that it would relocate £500 million-worth of resources to Manchester—Manchester, not the north-west; the BBC's press releases referred to Manchester. As one would expect, the local Manchester newspaper took a similar line. For example, on 21 January the Manchester Evening News reported that:

"Manchester is to boost its credentials as a major TV centre as independent companies follow the BBC's lead and head north."

[Mr. Kilfoyle]

Therefore, not only was the BBC to relocate part of its operations to Manchester, but the relocation of independents associated with some of the BBC departments that were transferring was on the cards. There is a question about what that means for the wider north-west.

In order to consider the matter in more detail, it was necessary to speak to representatives of various media interests and to read documentation. I read a report, "A New Vision for the BBC in the North", written by Mr. John Dickie, head of BBC public affairs. I thought that title reflected a typically London-centric view of the country: "in the north," "oop north"—it could be anywhere north of Watford." Nothing would have made the slightest difference to Mr. Dickie and his cohorts at the BBC—he went on ad nauseam in that document to emphasise just how little thought had gone into the ramifications of a transfer to Manchester, as opposed to the north or even the north-west, which is our concern in this debate.

Happily, I had a far more fruitful meeting with representatives of Ofcom, in which we looked at the review of public service broadcasting published in early February. Although I was appreciative of the range of its considerations, and of its intentions for public service broadcasting, especially regionally, there are gaps that need to be filled. For example, looking more closely at the proposals reveals that the new production partnership fund proposed by ITV plc is hardly generous: its value is £9 million over three years. We may say that that is a straw in the wind, although I would not disagree that it is heading in the right direction. However, £9 million distributed around the regions and nations of this sceptred isle is not a great deal to shell out to achieve the stated objective, which is to support the delivery of new ITV1 production requirements. In fact, I would argue that that is a derisory amount. Nevertheless, I accept that it is going in the right direction.

The aim is to introduce plurality through a thriving production sector, and to that end there will be an increased quota for ITV1's out-of-London production and commitment. However, as in all matters, the devil is in the detail. Ofcom stipulates a quota of 50 per cent. by value and volume, but what is out-of-London production, and how does it relate to quality and, critically, to the regional dimension? It is fair to cite a programme such as "Trisha", which is hardly enlightening to the good burghers of the north-west—one may as well watch Jerry Springer speaking in Swahili as watch some of those shows. Nevertheless, it could be defined as part of the 50 per cent. out-of-London production quota. What does that quota mean and who will actually make it?

We questioned Ofcom very closely on the potential for companies to set up shell companies that, to all intents and purposes, are new producers but that could very well involve the same personnel and owners under another guise. I was relieved to discover that Ofcom has thought about the potential for that. It says that it has means of ensuring that that does not happen and that there is new production in the regions. However, the definition is still loose.

The proposal is to maintain "typically" 5.5 hours per week of regional news. Well, the regional news in the north-west is hardly reflective of the north-west; it is probably more reflective of Greater Manchester. I was surprised when Ofcom told me that it had been assured—certainly by Granada, and I think by the BBC—that more bodies were being put out there on news gathering to increase coverage. I had to report—I am sure that colleagues will endorse this—that our subjective experience is quite the reverse: we think that there is less coverage of the north-west, or at least of huge parts of the region. Coverage does not spread to cover all parts of the region.

That assurance comes on the back of a long history of our being told one thing by the BBC and ITV, but seeing another. That was particularly the case with ITV when it was Granada and at the time of licence renewal, when there was talk of how the obligations under the licence would be met in terms of comprehensive coverage of a region, but the promised coverage simply did not materialise. Unless there is enforcement by the regulator, I have little faith that the undertakings entered into will be met. Ofcom tells me that it is determined to ensure that enforcement takes place and that it will monitor things closely, although I have to confess that I do not know what measures can be taken if people are once again in breach. The history in our region is one of increasing withdrawal from the commitments to the intra-regional coverage that we have been led to expect.

When we met Ofcom, I was particularly taken with one idea—that of the public service publisher. I have had the opportunity to speak to others and to read a little about that and it seems to be an extremely welcome idea. I understand that the public service publisher would be based in one of the regions away from the normal centres of media activity. No one will disagree with that. The idea has great potential to allow many things to happen at even sub-regional or local community level. A friend of mine, Mike Short, who used to be a producer for "World in Action", has involved himself in a co-operative exercise called Toxteth Television in the south end of Liverpool, and he is looking at a venture in my constituency in the north end of Liverpool. The idea is to enable communities to have access to the airwaves in a way that is meaningful to them and results in broadcasting that reflects their interests, instead of some of the tripe that is recycled by terrestrial and other broadcasters and force-fed to the nation. Perhaps such ventures will begin to release some of the great television potential that has hitherto gone unrealised.

We have great hopes for that idea in terms of its being located in the north-west and fitting in with the north-west digital platform. The north-west digital platform is not an easy concept for people such as me, who are naïve about broadcasting technology, to take in, but my understanding is that it will act as a gateway for the multitude of potential channels that will be open from 2008, with the onset of digitalisation. The question is how that can best be used to the advantage of all—producers and consumers—and to enhance the quality of broadcasting in every sense. It has been developed through Mersey Television and is supported by other organisations in the north-west and by people such as John Roberts of United Utilities, who is a prominent supporter of it, and John Bills of Trinity Mirror group newspapers. Those substantial individuals can see the merits of the north-west digital platform, how it can fit neatly with the public service publisher, and how it will, in turn, affect small community groups. I quoted Toxteth Television—a local group in my city—but with the new technologies that would be equally appropriate to Tower Hamlets television.

Referring to my earlier comments about the huge reservoir of talent that we have on Merseyside, the new technology means that we can use that talent, not only for the benefit of our local community, but for the benefit of communities and producers throughout the United Kingdom. Merseyside already has some advantages—as well as talent, I believe that we are the most wired-up city, literally and metaphorically, in the United Kingdom. We have the technology in place with which to do some marvellous things.

I bear in mind Ofcom's own definition of the public service publisher and what it is intended to do. It is to be "charged with developing services and content that take full advantage of new distribution technologies . . . a free-to-view premier content service and community services."

I hope that the Minister will respond with some encouraging words about the public service publisher, and where he thinks that that idea will end up. Although I understand that he cannot make a pledge on behalf of Merseyside any more than he can make a pledge on behalf of Sheffield, he will understand the arguments that are being made: that we do not want a London-centric broadcasting industry to be replaced by a London-and-Manchester-centric broadcasting industry. The new technologies allow us to be far more diverse than has hitherto been possible. We are entering an era in which we will have the choice instantaneously between watching a biopic of Mother Teresa or looking at the Chubby Chasers website, whatever our predilection might be. That is the kind of opportunity that the technology allows. It gives freedom of choice for the individual to access all the many sources of broadcasting.

I have a particular concern about some of the weaknesses in current legislation—

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): My hon. Friend rather brushed over the Chubby Chasers website. It may be for the benefit of the House to know that my hon. Friend enjoys iconic status on that particular website. Could he tell us a bit more about that?

Mr. Kilfoyle: That is one of those fables that are best left to gather dust. It originates with my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound), who is fond of fabricating exotic tales about people's status on even more exotic websites.

I return to the subject of the north-west digital platform. In 1989 Granada was challenged for the ITV franchise by North West Television, which offered to put the north-west into television service. Hon. Members will remember well the bold and imaginative plan to turn the focus away from being part of what was then regarded widely as a national cartel, and is now a national plc, to becoming a stand-alone, regionally focused broadcaster that made programmes for the north-west. There was nothing too dramatic in that, but it was a little too radical for its time. Sixteen years have passed, technology has moved on and the consolidation foreseen by North West Television has now begun. The people who identified with the region in the Bernstein era have all gone. It is fair to say that that arm of television has become just another business. It has lost the distinctiveness that Granada used to have.

We need a clear and simple mechanism of communication, knowledge transfer and information exchange and exhibition, as well as some celebratory space for people in the north-west in what will become a crowded and cluttered digital landscape. We do not know exactly where we shall go, but we are worried that, unless we are careful, we will be inundated not only with choice, but with mediocrity so lacking in clear identity that it would be a disservice not to flag up such matters now.

ITV is in retreat from regional programmes. Channel 4 and Five are national by definition. Both the public service publisher to which I alluded and the north-west digital platform are exciting and valid, but unproven concepts. We must look for a wee bit of certainty. In today's statement, the Secretary of State said that she had left an opening so that that the funding regime might change at some point in the future, but I thought that that was vague. I certainly hope that the Government are not considering doing it in the short term. Will my right hon. Friend the Minister clarify the position?

At present, only one public service broadcaster—the BBC—by its remit and by funding, reaches from national to regional to truly local services through, for example, its strong local radio services in my home town. The BBC wants to play to that strength and has announced plans to base a series of local digital television services on its existing local radio network, but there are difficulties with that and such proposals need to be thought through. The whole point about the technology is that developments are ongoing and not yet complete, and we do not know what the outcomes will be. We must be prepared to make the best and most varied possible use of those developments.

I wish to refer briefly to the move to Manchester by the BBC, which gave rise to the debate. The BBC is to move between 1,700 and 1,800 people to Manchester by 2010, but my research with the Manchester Evening News shows that, with independents moving there, too, the number of people moving might be between 2,500 and 3,000, which is a sizeable number. It is not for me to say to the BBC which of its departments it moves to Manchester, but it strikes me that BBC Online could well be based in Merseyside and enhance its service rather than have it diminished by the move. We have to be careful with new technology because of the provisos that I gave about it still being developed, but we have to recognise that location is not the determinant of where a service is best provided. Look at Manchester, where—once again—we will end up with empire building. The old Manchester building houses 700 or 800 people now, but a new centre is to be built and new hard infrastructure provided. Is that needed in Manchester?

I do not want to sound as though I am carping and whinging about Manchester and its success. I wish Manchester all the very best. It has done some good things, not least in television. In the old days, it provided not only the light entertainment typified by Granada's

[Mr. Kilfoyle]

"Coronation Street", but some very good investigative programmes, such as "World in Action". I would not detract from Manchester's history or its capacity and ability to promote itself and do well, but I honestly believe that when we look at the totality of the north-west—a heavily populated, relatively compact but diverse region—I question whether the concentration of facilities and investment in Manchester is something for the north-west as a whole to be pleased about.

I should point out our history. At one time, television facilities were promised—indeed, they were provided at one stage—by ITV, or Granada as it then was, in Lancaster, Preston, Liverpool and Chester. However, the ITV company clawed back from that provision, starting with the "This Morning" show with Richard and Judy, which was produced in Merseyside but was pulled out and taken to London. ITV has a mere token presence in Liverpool now. Not long ago, I asked it about the building in Liverpool in which it is housed, and I was told that it would be the base from which it would cover Liverpool's year of being the European capital of culture in 2008. However, I read the following week in the local newspaper that it was selling the building to national museums and galleries on Merseyside.

We have a history of not getting a fair share of the pie, and I do not believe that we are getting a fair share now. The truth of the matter is that the technology allows businesses—whether the BBC or ITV—to locate in a whole variety places. ITV is now being consolidated into one company, but despite its best wishes and the 50 per cent. of regionally produced programmes, I believe that ITV will become more London-centric. All Manchester is doing is following what happened for a while in the '70s. We are consolidating the BBC on two sites instead of one. I do not think that it is meeting the regional requirement in terms of jobs or best value. It is not reflecting, in any shape or form, what I understand still to be a prime requirement on both independent television and the BBC: ensuring that there is regional content that really reflects regional needs and diversity.

2.29 pm

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) on securing this important debate. I am a big supporter of BBC North West and ITV, but I believe that both organisations as they stand now are failing the north-west public. Regional programmes and news have declined in recent years, and the quality and content of the programmes is on a downward spiral. If both ITV and the BBC are to justify their charter and licence obligations, we should be able to expect high standards from both organisations. As far as I can see there is reduced coverage of local and national political issues. There is a lot less coverage of Westminster and party conferences. I was amazed to discover that ITV no longer had a desk at party conferences. ITV journalists wandered around without a base. It was difficult for politicians who wanted to talk to them about some of the issues that were being addressed at the conference to get in touch with them. It is certainly a step backwards, in my view.

The current affairs programmes that we see on both BBC and ITV in the north-west are of a lower quality and the coverage is not what it used to be. Most of the current programmes are of the "Kilroy" variety. They take complex issues and turn them into soundbites. They prefer to provoke political punch-ups than to get to the bottom of a complex issue or to inform the general public. They are more of an entertainment. They deal with trivia, gossip and scandal. A typical example would be the recent programme in which a prospective parliamentary candidate was selected. I do not know whether any other Members watched that, but I watched with horror as a racist was eventually chosen as the most suitable candidate to stand in the forthcoming general election. That is unacceptable television. It drags standards down even lower.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Although I agree with the sentiments, I had the good fortune to speak to some of the contestants on that programme. One thing that came out of their experience was that they had increasing respect for existing MPs and how hard they work.

Mr. Watts: I take the point. Most people were horrified, but people said to me that having watched the potential candidates they appreciated that politicians had a difficult job and had to take some tough decisions from time to time. Those programmes do nothing to inform the general public. They do not help people to digest complex issues and to come to a firm conclusion on them. They are almost turning our TV in the north-west into a daily Hello! magazine where the quality is now so poor that if a topic does not involve gossip or scandal, it is not worth covering.

That does not mean that all our programmes are bad. I should like to pay tribute to Jim Hancock's programme. Jim is knowledgeable. He is well researched. He is fair and he tries to deal in a sensitive and informative way with the current issues. However, at one time we could have expected to see Jim popping up with local issues in the current affairs programme during the week. I do not see that now, and when I asked him why he told me that he does put issues forward to the BBC but often they cannot be found a place within the current affairs programme.

Mr. Kilfoyle: Given that Jim Hancock's contribution is like a pearl cast before swine compared with so much of the rest, who does my hon. Friend think is responsible for allowing the programme makers or the commissioning editors steadily to degrade the quality of the shows on offer on television?

Mr. Watts: The responsibility lies with the management of those organisations. The north-west group of MPs will be inviting the head of the regional programme news to a meeting to discuss some of the issues that we are raising. Generally most of us are dissatisfied with the management of both those organisations as regards regional programming. It will be difficult to change both organisations. When I speak to representatives of the BBC and ITV, they seem to think that politicians should support them because they are there. They say, "Well, we are Granada and we have existed for many years, so just support us." The only justification for granting a charter, and for allowing people to be charged a licence fee, is that the broadcasters provide good-quality programmes and deal with regional issues. If they fail to do that, we will have to look at other forms of media, and my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton has suggested ways to do that.

There must be a complete review of both those organisations. The regulator needs to look far more closely at the content of their programmes. He also needs to hold them to the agreements they made when the charters were first signed, because I do not believe that they are maintaining the conditions of their charter. They should be challenged on a regular basis if that can be proved, and I think evidence could be provided to demonstrate that.

Mr. Kilfoyle: My hon. Friend will recall that I mentioned that all the major players made contact with me to discuss the subject of this debate and its impact on them, with the exception of Granada. Nobody from its management has bothered to make a representation of their views on today's debate and how it relates to them. As this debate is about the region that was Granada's birthplace and with which it is identified, does my hon. Friend not think that that smacks of arrogance towards those who have a legitimate concern about public service broadcasting in the north-west?

Mr. Watts: It undoubtedly demonstrates that there is an element in each organisation that does not have enough respect for the charter it signed up to and its individual responsibilities. Those organisations are not slow to come forward when their charter is due for renewal; in fact, we fall over them during that short period. But they seem to believe that once the charter has been granted they can do whatever they want for the rest of the time—they can reduce the amount of political coverage or regional programming, or dumb down programmes that were flagship shows in the past.

I obviously welcome the BBC decision to decentralise, but it does not go far enough. When I first went to BBC television centre as a newly elected MP, I was amazed. I was staggered by the size of the operation. Someone offered to show me around the centre, and they took me to one floor that dealt only with e-mails, and hundreds of staff were located there. It has hundreds, if not thousands, of journalists, and it occupies some of the most expensive real estate in the world. It delivers the broadcasting we need in the most costly way. Why should not some of that work go out to other regions?

The BBC's decision to decentralise is a small step; we need to do much more. We have a right to expect the BBC to decentralise as much it can, and to be a national body that represents different regions and to provide jobs and opportunities for the creative talents that exist in those regions so that they can flourish. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton highlighted that that talent does exist in areas such as the north-west, and specifically in places such as Liverpool.

Mr. Kilfoyle: My hon. Friend touched on the important point of the cost of the land and the buildings that the BBC owns in London and elsewhere. Would he therefore agree that the amount of money that is being spent on a new centre in Manchester would be best spent on commissioning new programmes across the region rather than on another great big piece of capital investment, especially when it is questionable whether that is actually required?

Mr. Watts: I think so. I hope that the decentralisation of BBC services will be a continual programme, and that over the coming years more and more of those functions will be put out to the regions. I certainly think they should be spread around regions; I do not see why Manchester or Liverpool, or any one centre, should get the whole of the operation.

Frankly, I think that the BBC is very bad at managing its resources. People quite rightly criticise the size of the licence fee and the amount of money that the general public have to pay for the BBC. The least it can do is ensure that it is as cost-efficient as it can be. It cannot be cost-efficient while the majority of the programmes and the majority of the organisation are based in London. That runs counter to any logical argument. The second thing that people can expect from the BBC is higher quality. It should set the targets for other media and broadcasters to follow. It is running scared of satellite services. It is dumbing down programmes and running after the same sort of audience. In doing so, it is doing a disservice to itself and to the general public.

Our democratic system relies on the information flow to the general public. If we are not going to use the television systems—the BBCs and the ITVs—to get over the complex issues and to start to debate them, and to explain what we are doing in places such as this one about addressing those serious issues, how will we have a thriving democracy?

It is about time that the Government took a tough line with these people and set out clear, precise, rational ideas about what they want from the BBC and from the independent ITV services. The regulator should take a much tougher line if they fail to meet standards. We want to see them not just once every five years or whenever the charter is renewed. We should have a regular review to ensure that they are delivering what they promised. In terms of both the BBC and ITV services, failures are taking place.

I hope that this debate will start one within the BBC and ITV, and I hope that they will start to realise that they cannot take the support that I think they enjoy from most people in this Room unless they deliver the product that we expect them to. It is a sad day when MPs have to stand up and say that.

I am not having a go at individuals in the BBC or ITV. I like most of the people who work in both those services. Many of the creative people and the people in front of the camera understand what we are saying. If they were not employed by those organisations, they would be making the same points as myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton have made today. I hope that the management will start to examine the issue. We need to hand some things back.

Mr. Kilfoyle: I share my hon. Friend's admiration for many of the individuals. Does he not think that because of the nature of the institutions and the effect on individuals, we end up with a situation where, as I understand it, as the departments move from London, the independents that supply them move up from

[Mr. Kilfoyle]

London to Manchester? Hat Trick Productions is among those. Ironically, it is owned by a fellow Evertonian and Liverpool person, Jimmy Mulville. I am not saying that he is any less committed to Merseyside than any of us would be, but the institutions stick together. Their interests are knitted into each other. The individual ceases to have an individual perspective on what is good in the wider context of broadcasting.

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend is far more knowledgeable about these things than I, but I take the point that he made. We do not just want the existing services decentralised to our region. We want our region to be able to develop its own programmes and to focus on local issues in current affairs, general programmes and news. We want a north-west based service that deals with north-west issues.

It is ironic that when I meet people in the media around here, they often come from the north-west. My hon. Friend just mentioned one such person. It is amazing. One falls over such people down here. All those people have to travel down to London to make a career in television and it is a disgrace. As I said, it makes no economic or cultural sense. The sooner we get back to a system where the BBC represents us all and not just a small elite in London, the better.

2.44 pm

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) on his good fortune in securing this debate and on the comprehensive way in which he introduced the subject.

We are all anxious to emphasise that this is not another scouser whinge. We are not complaining that Manchester is getting a bigger share of the cake or voicing sub-regional enmity towards Manchester based on football rivalry or some esoteric event in the past. We are certainly not going to bring the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) into the debate; enough has been said on that subject. What my hon. Friend has described is a systemic failure. Large corporations do not know how to provide services that are essentially regional in character—that is the truth of the matter. The business logic of their position is always to go back to what they know best and centralise everything, usually in London. My hon. Friend, other people and I have tried to address these problems over the years, and he rehearsed the arguments more fully than I need to. Repeatedly, we have been given assurances about services that would be located on Merseyside and for a short while they have been, but as soon as it has become inconvenient to maintain them, away they go. Until the next time there is some negotiation about charters or licence fees, the issue is completely forgotten about. That is how large corporate bodies operate.

I listened to the statement made by the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sportin the Chamber this afternoon. I was particularly encouraged by what she said about regional broadcasting—that "To reflect the whole of the United Kingdom and its different and diverse communities, the BBC also needs to make sure that a significant slice of production takes place outside London. It needs to provide a specific range of services for the UK's nations and regions. People should see the full diversity of the UK and their local communities reflected in mainstream as well as regional programming." That is what is to happen in the BBC, and is precisely the direction in which my hon. Friends the Members for Liverpool, Walton and for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) and I are trying to steer provision.

Mr. Watts: Does my hon. Friend agree that unless the Government, the regulator or both stipulate precisely what they want in the charter—the proportion of programmes that are to be made outside London—it is likely that the BBC will resist increasing that proportion more than it has to? Does he believe that the regulator should set out the proportion of programmes that should be made in the regions?

Mr. Howarth: I agree, but there are such proportions tied to the charter and the arrangements that Ofcom is negotiating with ITV. My contention is that the issue is not so much about what the proportions should be, but about how the BBC goes about its business. As my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton mentioned, it could do exactly what it is doing now but simply put a brass plate on a building and say that it is achieving the required proportion because it has an office in some part of Liverpool or Manchester. Ofcom is particularly alert to that possibility and, hopefully, will police the issue more fully in future.

Mr. Kilfoyle: I ask my hon. Friend to reconsider what our hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North has said. I understand him to be saying that something should be written in legislation to ensure that neither ITV plc nor the BBC can evade their responsibilities.

Mr. Howarth: Generally, I agree; I simply did not want to get involved in a debate about proportions, although I intend to cover how such matters should be guaranteed in future. My hon. Friends make a good point.

My first point is similar to one made by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North about what gets covered by whom and where. The current preoccupation in news and current affairs is with headline issues. If there is a big issue in Liverpool and stations have someone available, they might send a film crew out to cover it, but there are all sorts of things going on below the radar that nobody covers.

I have a specific example. On Monday morning my hon. Friend and I attended an event in his constituency organised by the Young Women's Christian Association. It involved a group of—from what I could gather—teenage and single mothers talking about the difficulties that they experienced. Their agenda was for better buggy access to public transport and more breastfeeding facilities in all sorts of places. What took place was a fascinating discussion about how they got to where they were, the problems that they face and what they think that schools should have done. I will not bore the Chamber with what they think about men in general, but it is not very flattering. That would have made fascinating television, but who turned up? The St. Helens Star, Radio Merseyside and a couple of other print journalists attended, but nobody from the television companies did so, even though it would have been a fascinating film. Such activity is replicated all over Merseyside, and probably all over the north-west, and nobody expresses the slightest interest in it.

My second point, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton also referred, is that there is an enormous amount of talent. Liverpool John Moores university, with which I have an association as an alumnus and as the father of another graduate—my oldest son—has an excellent facility for training film and television programme makers. In fact, it covers the whole gamut of media studies—a branch of learning that takes a knocking in some quarters but covers a growing market with a growing number of jobs. There are talented people on Merseyside but, as my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North said, they mostly end up having to go somewhere else. How do young potential programme and film makers get into the corporations that have the power to commission programmes? I do not know, but there are some things that can be done to encourage them.

The same is true of young musicians. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton is involved in the Mersey music industry and was instrumental in the organisation of a very good concert in support of UNICEF. There are a lot of young musicians about, but how do they ever get showcased? Who takes any interest in them? If there were another Beatles out there, would anybody actually spot them? I do not know that anybody is producing the music programmes that provide local or regional opportunities.

Mr. Kilfoyle: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. The first time that the Beatles made a breakthrough was when they played Granada's evening magazine programme, which introduced them to a wider audience outside Merseyside. That is the very type of programme that the channels want to do away with, so what opportunities will there be for those young people to get a break?

Mr. Howarth: As ever, my hon. Friend adds great weight to my argument. A serious amount of young talent is simply not being tapped, but what can be done about it?

My hon. Friend mentioned the potential of a north-west digital platform. Like my right hon. Friend the Minister, when I was young I trained in engineering, but as my family will confirm, I am so technophobic now that my sister-in-law managed to receive 14 texts from my new mobile phone that I never sent. I am hopelessly incompetent with technology, and if I were to show the next part of my speech to my family they would laugh loudly.

The north-west digital platform is made up of three constituent parts: first, a digital television channel; secondly, a digital content hub and, thirdly, a broadband internet site—that is how my hon. Friend managed to link it into his Chubby Chasers website, about which he earlier refused to reveal more. That is the basic proposal from Phil Redmond of Mersey Television, who says:

"The platform will initially occupy a dedicated television channel available on digital satellite (BSkyB), digital terrestrial (Freeview) and digital cable (Telewest e.g.). This channel will become the region's digital shop-window promoting and showcasing regionally produced content, products and services on a free-to-air basis."

That is where we want to go. That is how all that young talent will be identified and developed.

At this stage, it is only a proposal on the Secretary of State's desk, but Ofcom is proposing a public service publishing fund of £300 million. A public service publisher means something slightly different from the traditional publisher. There will be an access fund—a way of commissioning that is outside the stultifying central way of doing things at present. I support Ofcom's proposal, which provides a means by which the deficiencies that we have described can be put right. It is important not only to get the money in place but to ensure that the fund is properly administered in a way that meets the regional objectives and that it can be accessed by independent people outside ITV, Five, Channel 4 and the BBC. The only way we will expand regional input and output is by encouraging more independent people to be involved and giving them the means to do it.

To return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton in an intervention, my right hon. Friend the Minister should ensure that such matters are nailed down in legislation where that is appropriate, or, if it is not appropriate, in proper regulations. Too many promises have been made that were never delivered because there was no statutory basis on which they were given. If Ofcom says that something will be done, it should be codified and monitored to ensure that it actually does what it says it will do.

The BBC has an obligation to consider the potential on Merseyside—my hon. Friends and I include St. Helens, Knowsley and Sefton as well as Liverpool in that area, and my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) would add Wirral, too. The potential is there and if BBC Online can be relocated, I hope that my hon. Friend and his ministerial colleagues will point the BBC in the direction of Merseyside because we have a great deal to offer.

There are many things that can be done and there is a great deal of potential out there. I hope that the Government, whom I support in almost everything, will act as the catalyst to ensure that the potential is used to make programmes and films, that performing is encouraged and that they ensure that the fascinating things that are going on below the radar are broadcast so people can see what is going on at community level.

3 pm

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): When I entered the room, I was genuinely horrified to hear the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) speaking. I know that that is a common reaction, but in my case it was because I had mistimed the sitting. My hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) asked me to speak on his behalf in this debate and, despite my grovelling apologies for being late, that decision will have a beneficial outcome, because I can guarantee that I will be even more supportive of the general thrust of the hon. Gentleman's argument—possibly even more so than my hon. Friend.

I was sorry to miss the first part of the hon. Gentleman's contribution. He has bravely broken the golden rule of the politician, which is not to annoy the media—a rule to which I subscribe in most circumstances. Very few people break that rule. The Mayor of London is an exception and the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) has done it to some extent on this occasion, but politicians normally do not do it. People might have expected the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton to defer to that rule and not put his city before transient popularity, but he seems to have done precisely the reverse.

[Dr. John Pugh]

There is a false choice on offer, because the BBC can genuinely be persuaded that it is in its interest to look harder at Liverpool. That is not an anti-Manchester point, but a recognition of the position that I hope the BBC will bear in mind. The BBC needs to take into account important sub-regional interests and genuine sub-regional differences, which should be reflected in regional broadcasting. I welcome the move of the BBC and its executive to the north. In turn, the BBC should welcome the wealth and diversity of talent that it will find there and recognise that, whatever it thinks, the north-west is not homogenous and that centralisation exclusively in Manchester might be a mistake.

We are all aware, as are broadcasters in Merseyside, how poor the BBC facilities are. I understand that there is only one small studio in Paradise street that contains little modern, up-to-date equipment and requires considerable technical assistance from the Manchester end. That is not desirable in Liverpool, a capital of culture and one of Britain's major cities. I concur with the sentiments of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton and I support their general thrust.

Public service broadcasting in general was mentioned by the hon. Member for St. Helens, North, who has observed, as do we all, what I call the tabloidisation of the BBC and its tendency to reduce serious issues to simple conflicts of opinion. One can understand to some extent the BBC's point of view—it feels obliged to demonstrate that it can get the ratings to justify the money that it charges the public, so it has two competing objectives: first, to get the ratings, and secondly, to be a responsible public service broadcaster. The result is a muddle, because those are two different things: one deals with what is attractive to the public and the other deals with what is important to the public, and the two things do not necessarily coincide. There is a resolution to that difficulty for the BBC, which is to make the genuinely important things attractive. That is not impossible; it can and should be done.

I concur with the sentiments expressed by other hon. Members. Regional journalism, whether in the broadcast media or the press, and even local journalism in our own areas, is in many ways individualistic, sharp-edged. It has a great deal to contribute. Since coming to Westminster, I have been amazed by the somewhat herd-like tendencies of the parliamentary lobby and the national media. Perhaps I may give a recent, slightly controversial example. If I were to tell my local press that I was to make an announcement about something on Monday, they would say, "Well, we'll wait until Monday. You go ahead and do it and we will report you then." However, I note that in their pre-election run-up the Conservatives tell us each Sunday what they will announce on Monday and receive massive coverage throughout the BBC. That strikes me as a bizarre journalistic response, but that is by the bye.

Mr. Watts: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the media pursue such policies because that takes less time and effort than delving into a subject, researching it and providing the resources to carry out such activity? It is much simpler to deal with soundbites. One of the things that worries me about the BBC, which should set standards, is that it is not putting into programmes the resources needed to make sure that they are well produced, well researched and deal with the important issues that we face daily.

Dr. Pugh: Yes, research takes time and money but might fill no more column inches than the tittle-tattle to which the hon. Gentleman has drawn attention. A relatively trivial exchange at Prime Minister's Question Time can fill the same slot as a substantially and expensively researched programme that contains genuinely novel information. We need a strong regional voice but, as the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton said, one that reflects the diversity of the region.

3.6 pm

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) on obtaining the debate on a day when broadcasting is particularly topical and when most of us are focusing on the BBC. I hope that that will mean that his remarks receive even greater attention than they would otherwise.

As a Member of Parliament who represents a constituency in Essex, which is some way removed from north-west England, I take a relatively neutral position in the debate between Manchester and Liverpool. The hon. Gentleman is correct to say that, when I read the subject of his debate on the Order Paper, I was not entirely clear what he wished to pursue. He informed me helpfully of that before the debate, so I shall be brief.

Mr. Kilfoyle: When I spoke to the hon. Gentleman, I was not entirely clear myself about the subject matter of the debate. He should not be put off by the fact that he represents an Essex constituency. After all, the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) received copious coverage in the north-west not so long ago.

Mr. Whittingdale: It is my hon. Friend's experience that causes me to be even more cautious and perhaps more brief than I would usually be.

The hon. Gentleman said that ITV had apparently shown little interest in his debate, but I want to say a few words in defence of ITV. It sent me a brief on its activities in the north-west for use in the debate, which I shall be happy to share with him after our discussions if he has not seen it. ITV has been a regionally structured entity. We have recently seen the coming together of the regional companies to form ITV plc, which is probably in the interests of ITV in the new, much more competitive broadcasting environment. We have also received assurances, which I hope will be kept to, that ITV will remain very much regionally focused. Granada, its regional company in the north-west, is perhaps one of the best-known companies—if not the best known—in the group. ITV has made clear to me that it employs 1,000 core staff in the region and that it contributes £150 million to the creative economy in the north-west, which I understand is now the heart of ITV's children's programming.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) referred to the controversial production, "Vote for Me", which I, too, watched with some horror. Having seen the effect on the music industry of "Pop Idol", I was concerned that "Vote for Me" might have a similar effect on the House of Commons. The fact that almost no one watched it is therefore of some comfort to me. I do not think that we can expect Mr. Hilton-Potts to arrive here after the general election.

Dr. Pugh: It seems that the ratings for the Parliamentary channel are somewhat similar.

Mr. Whittingdale: That is true, although I have been critical of the way in which all broadcasters—the BBC, in particular—have tended to marginalise parliamentary coverage. There is a dedicated BBC Parliament channel, so they might consider that there is less need to cover the activities of Parliament on the main channels, but that is a serious mistake. I was glad to learn that rumours that "Yesterday in Parliament" was to be done away with are untrue.

ITV has a good record on regional production. It has a quota of about 33 per cent., but actually achieves about 51 per cent. It does so because it believes that it is in its interests to do so, not because it is required of it by statute.

Mr. Kilfoyle: Surely the reason that ITV's regional production exceeds 50 per cent. is purely historical, in that it was formed by regional companies coming together. The question of what constitutes a regionally produced programme remains. What does that term mean? The hon. Gentleman might recall that I mentioned the example of the "Trisha" programme.

Mr. Whittingdale: The precise definition of what is a regional production occupied us at considerable length in our deliberations on the Communications Bill. To some extent, regional programming is more important to the viewer than regional production. Viewers want to watch programmes that relate specifically to their region; the location of the office of the company that made the programme does not necessarily matter to them.

That brings me to the question of regional programming, and the difficulty that ITV will face in continuing to sustain it at present levels. Ofcom analysis highlighted the competitive pressure that ITV now faces and the fact that producing regional programming is much more costly than network production. If I recall correctly, about two thirds of the total cost of the public service obligation on ITV stems from regional programming obligations.

Mr. Kilfoyle: The hon. Gentleman is confusing me. Ofcom does not address programming; it addresses ITV1's quota for out-of-London production. The hon. Gentleman appears to be defending ITV when it is not necessarily being attacked, except in terms of that single definition. What does he think out-of-London production actually means?

Mr. Whittingdale: The hon. Gentleman is right to distinguish between regional production and regional programming; they are totally different, and the quota I mentioned is for regional production. However, I also want to talk about regional programming, because that is important in terms of reflecting the way of life in the north-west. It is an expensive activity for ITV to undertake—indeed, in some cases, the regional production quotas may increase costs. Ofcom rightly identifies a problem in that ITV is having to compete against broadcasters that are not subject to public service obligations, and the value that ITV currently enjoys from having access to the analogue spectrum is diminishing as a result of the steady growth of digital penetration. Ofcom rightly flagged up the problems ITV will face, which led it to recommend that the obligation for non-news and current affairs regional programming should be reduced.

Two hon. Members referred to the Ofcom proposal for a public service publisher. I do not find that option attractive: I am not drawn to the idea of creating another nationalised broadcaster at a time when there is a proliferation of channels. However, I regret the Secretary of State's apparent dismissal of the recommendation of Lord Burns to allow commercial broadcasters to have access to licence fee money. We understand that that was supported by Lord Birt in No. 10 Downing street, but it did not find favour in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. I regret that, because that recommendation provides a potential solution to the problem that ITV will face in maintaining public service broadcasting. If people believe that it is important that commercial television companies continue to offer regional programming, whether from the north-west or elsewhere, supporting them to do so seems an appropriate use of public money. That could have been achieved under that recommendation in the Burns report.

ITV is a commercial company. It must compete and survive in the marketplace, unlike the BBC. The BBC receives £2.8 billion of public money and is rightly subject to strong public service obligations. It has something like 27,000 employees, and I entirely share the feelings expressed by the hon. Member for St. Helens, North about visiting television centre and seeing miles and miles of corridors. There is no question that it is expensive to produce programmes in London and the south-east, and the BBC has a duty to be present across the whole of the United Kingdom. For that reason, I support, so far as it goes, the transfer of programme making away from London to Manchester. I understand the feeling of the Merseyside Members here today that Manchester may not seem a huge improvement on London. The BBC, on the other hand, says that the move will help to create a hub of media excellence, which is what it is trying to do in Manchester.

Where I feel the BBC could do more, and from which Merseyside could benefit—as would every area of the United Kingdom—would be to increase by a significant amount the proportion of its programmes made by independent production companies. The Government imposed on the BBC a requirement to meet a 25 per cent. quota of independent production. It is a disgrace that, for a number of years in succession, the BBC has failed to meet that quota. It has now said that it will view it as an absolute minimum and has talked about creating a window of opportunity for the next 25 per cent. I was interested in the Secretary of State's remark a couple of hours ago that she feels that that may not go far enough. I certainly do not feel that it goes far enough. The BBC has enormous power to encourage the creative economy in Merseyside and throughout the United Kingdom by investing more in independent production. I urge the Secretary of State to do more than just consider that.

[Mr. Whittingdale]

The other area that I should like to touch on is radio. When discussing broadcasting, it is very easy to concentrate on television and forget about radio. Radio is very locally based and some of the most successful radio stations are plugged into the centre of their communities. I also welcome, therefore, the opportunities that the Communications Act 2003 will provide for even more localised radio stations, such as community radio.

I end by agreeing strongly with the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton about the potential for alternative forms of broadcasting, particularly the internet and through the growth of new technology. There is no doubt that the world is changing very rapidly indeed. In some ways, the idea of the BBC or ITV dominating the broadcasting sector will not survive for much longer. As we move into an age of multimedia convergence, the opportunities for extremely localised broadcasting—Toxteth Television or the Chubby Chasers website, which I am clearly going to have rush from the Chamber to access—represent a potentially very important new sector in the media. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on obtaining this debate and wish him well in his efforts to attract even more of the creative economy into his city.

3.18 pm

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): I shall try to remain within the confines of the title of the debate—broadcasting in the north-west of England—and not stray too far from that.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) on securing the debate. He knows as well as other hon. Members who have participated that it has been the subject of a number of Adjournment debates in the House. There is tremendous interest in regional television, particularly in an age when broadcasting is increasingly a global business. I am particularly reassured to see so much affection for programmes that reflect the identities of different groups and regions around the country. I suppose, to use the jargon, that it is a case of "think globally, act locally".

I should like to take this opportunity to emphasise the Government's real commitment to the regional dimension of public service broadcasting. That has been reflected this afternoon in the statement on the broadcasting Green Paper made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. We also built it into the Communications Act 2003, ensuring that broadcasters continue to invest time and money in producing high quality programmes for the regions.

A key challenge that now faces the regulator—Ofcom—is how public service obligations, such as programming for the nations and the regions, can best be maintained in a period of rapidly increasing competition and the huge impact of digital take-up. That is where Ofcom's review of public service television broadcasting and the future extent of regional broadcasting on commercial channels become important. The third and final phase of Ofcom's review was published a few weeks ago and has been fed into the charter review process. The charter review Green Paper has been published today.

An important part of Ofcom's review is the examination of ITV's public service obligations and the requirements placed on it to produce a certain amount of regional programming. Those obligations are set out in the 2003 Act, and Ofcom has the responsibility of implementing them. Notably, it has to define what constitutes, in the words of section 287 of the Act, a "sufficient amount" of regional programming in the context of ITV's overall public service obligations. As has been indicated, ITV has already pledged £50 million to ensure continued investment in its regional network production.

Mr. Kilfoyle: What does a "sufficient amount" mean?

Mr. Caborn: As the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) said, that was the subject of debate during the passage of the Communications Act. It is Ofcom's responsibility under section 287 of the 2003 Act to determine what is a "sufficient amount" of regional programming.

As I said, ITV has already pledged £50 million to ensure continued investment in its regional network production. That will secure a move to more out-of-London production. ITV has shown further commitment to regional news by beginning a £40 million investment programme in its digital news centres across the UK.

Ofcom is therefore faced with some hard choices. Those who disagree with its conclusions that the current regional broadcasting quotas are unsustainable need to be able to demonstrate either that ITV can sustain all its public service broadcasting obligations regardless of the impact of increased competition, or that some other element of its obligations should be removed.

Mr. Watts: I expect the ITV companies to pursue the argument that has been advanced by the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford—that financial pressures mean that they cannot do what we would like them to do. Can my right hon. Friend assure me that he will resist any push by the regulator or the ITV companies to diminish the amount of regional programming? I have no doubt that there is an ITV offensive now going on—we heard that the Opposition spokesman has been briefed—and I suspect that it relates to the justification for not fulfilling the charter.

Mr. Caborn: One could take that view. However, central to the third phase of Ofcom's consultation will be the importance of fulfilling the public sector broadcasting regional requirement. That is on the agenda right now. Those issues must be addressed now, when we have some time to develop a sustainable model that could continue throughout the whole of the switchover period.

One of the ways in which we can ensure that broadcasting reflects the diversity of the region is to increase out-of-London production, in line with the move to regionalise and to move economic activity out of the south-east and London arising from the Gershon report. Where the Government have direct control, we have taken a political decision. We asked Gershon to examine how we could move civil servants out of London into the regions. That was clearly a political decision that matches what is happening in the Northern Way and what we have done through the regional development agencies. We believe that the current economic model, with under-utilisation in some regions and potential overheating in others, is not a good one, so the Government are trying to rebalance the economy by leading from the front.

We must also consider major investments, which are drivers of economic growth and wealth creation—universities, transport infrastructure and broadcasting, which we are discussing now. We welcomed the BBC's decision. There was no intervention by Government, because the BBC is independent of Government. We should congratulate the BBC on the proposals to move a large part of its business to Manchester. I know that my hon. Friends have some doubts about it, but in the macro-scheme of things, we should welcome the fact that the Beeb has taken the decision to move out of London into the regions—not just to Manchester, but to Birmingham and Bristol as well. Where it has started to move out in a systematic way, it ought to be supported.

Mr. Kilfoyle: I understand where the Minister is coming from, but surely he recognises that it is a London-centric mindset that drives the proposal. There is no real commitment to diversify across the country. Manchester would be like a colonial outpost for the BBC: it would be relocating something that is not indigenous to the region, because its thinking is set in a different mode.

Mr. Caborn: I do not accept that rationale at all. What about Bristol, Birmingham and Manchester? If I may be so bold as to say so, I think that my hon. Friend has tunnel vision. He ought to be looking at how the centre of excellence and the critical mass can be used in the north-west.

Another, quite unrelated, issue on which discussions took place in the north-west was how the region could it get its two airports, John Lennon and Manchester, working together for the north-west, rather than allowing them to operate in total opposition and competition with each other. I would suggest that, on this issue, there is no reason at all why Liverpool and Manchester cannot come together in the creative industries. I am not just talking about the Beeb but the whole creative industries infrastructure. One of the biggest areas of growth now in terms of wealth creation is within the creative industries, of which this is part.

Mr. Kilfoyle: The Minister mentions Glasgow, Bristol and Birmingham. I can tell him exactly what they are getting: a commissioning editor, comedy, in Glasgow; a commissioning editor, documentaries, in Bristol; a commissioning editor, factual and entertainment for day time—whatever that may mean—in Birmingham; and nothing at all in Manchester in the short term.

Mr. Caborn: When we talk about the BBC moving out of London, it should be seen as part of a synergy of activity within the creative industries, which are now an important area of wealth creation. The Government welcome that. As the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford said, the role of the ITV structure is also important. There is a lot of added value to be gained by the developments in the creative industries. Our universities have now woken up, albeit somewhat late, to that potential; they are now part of that critical mass in the creative industries using intellectual property. Now there is the merging of television, computerisation and design, we are seeing a significant growth in the regions that was not there before.

I hear what my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton says about talent, whether among writers or composers. That talent has now found a platform inside the region that it never had before. In my city of Sheffield, our creative industries are employing well over 2,000 people in quality jobs. That activity is strongly linked with the universities. Yes, I could argue that the BBC and to a lesser extent ITV have not actually got the investment into Sheffield, but into somewhere in Leeds. There is an argument about centralisation within the region, but it is better for the BBC and ITV to move out of London into the regions first; then we can argue about how we will distribute that development within the regions. We are not just talking about broadcasting. The changes have to be seen in a wider context.

Health Services (Hemel Hempstead)

3.30 pm

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): I am glad to see that the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman)—the Minister for Thanet—is here. We shall be able to resume our discussion, and possibly our duels, on this matter.

I want to focus on acute services in my constituency. However, it is worth saying at the outset that there has recently been steady progress on many fronts on health in my constituency. For instance, in the past those who had had strokes were often left with very little support or assistance. However, recently a new stroke unit at Hemel Hempstead hospital has been offering a much-extended and appropriate service. I should like to place on the record my thanks to the many voluntary bodies that campaigned so hard for that, including Dacorum hospital action group, and to the Government for having the courage to increase national insurance by 1p to raise the funds to improve our health services.

Although similar developments for some other serious conditions are at an earlier stage in terms of effective provision, I am encouraged by the Minister's recent reply to me about the provision of nursing specialists for conditions such as Parkinson's disease and multiple sclerosis. In general, there has been a very welcome focus on the plight of those with chronic long-term conditions. For that group to be helped, health services need to be willing to have a close liaison with social services. Hertfordshire has been a leading authority in making progress in that area, with explicit Government support. A good Government produce real benefits, particularly for those groups of people who have reached a time of life or who are in such a condition that they need the help of others. In that regard, the Government are a good Government carrying out their mandate. However, it is inevitable that in an Adjournment debate I should focus on those areas in which the train looks a bit as if it is coming off the rails, and that is my intention.

As far as the community that I represent is concerned, the body that occasions so much grief is called the Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire strategic health authority. I want to make it clear that I realise that health provision needs to be planned outside the scope of a single constituency—or possibly that of a single county, although that would be more difficult. However, a lot of the complaints that I wish to make relate very much to the people who have been given that job and how they have chosen to do it.

It was pretty unusual that a newspaper advert by the Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire health authority—"Healthcare fit for Herts"—was taken to the Advertising Standards Authority, which found that the advertisement was deceptive. That is an astonishing thing to happen to a public body, and there ought to be much more public accountability when that kind of thing happens. Recently, that health authority had another shot: "Better care for sick children", it said. In that advertisement it talked about there being a bigger, purpose-built ward, although we know that beds for children in the area are going to be reduced from 35 to 26. That advertisement, too, will doubtless end up at the Advertising Standards Authority, but this time we would welcome the Minister's interest in the fact that a public body has used public money to give a demonstrably false impression to the public.

It has not simply been that. An edition of the Health Service Journal recently had a brief headline; the letter F was followed by three stars, which were followed by the word "off". One does not need to be a genius to work out what the stars stood for. That expression was used repeatedly by the chief executive of the strategic health authority and was directed at the chief executive of the West Hertfordshire Hospitals trust at a Christmas dinner.

The result of that exchange was that it made the headlines of the Health Service Journal, as it should, as an example of the sort of behaviour that should not be tolerated in public servants. It also occasioned the resignation of the chief executive of that trust, someone who had the trust of the community that I represent. The person who preceded the current occupant of the chief executive's chair of the strategic health authority, John de Braux, also had that trust.

The previous incumbent was Jane Herbert. She made every effort to understand the Hertfordshire health economy and the role that Hemel Hempstead hospital in particular, and the large undeveloped site next to it, could play in trying to secure improved health provision for the people of my constituency and those around it.

I put it to the Minister that not simply is such behaviour, on the face of it, at least problematic, but it is extremely strange that there seems to be no way in which that behaviour can be called into question, as it should be.

The advertisement that I mentioned gave what I can only call a pernicious interpretation of a health strategy that people have been using. The pernicious interpretation involves projecting forward to 2012, when, we are told, there will be marvellous new facilities at Hatfield and Watford. I have in front of me an artist's impression of a field, which is yet to be designated, and a wonderful new hospital at Hatfield. So far, so good. I hope that the people of Hatfield enjoy their new facility. That is not the issue. The issue is whether, as part of that strategy, we should be planning for a reduced service in certain areas of the county.

On Monday, I went to a meeting to discuss the reconfiguration of children's services in my area; it was not a reconfiguration, but a contraction—from a significant number of beds to rather less. The pernicious interpretation of the strategy involves the idea of creating a hospital at Watford one day, costing, let us say, £330 million. It will be accessible by some kind of monorail from Hemel Hempstead, which will get people there in, let us say, 10 minutes. I suspect that if that were the case, there might not be too much worry in my constituency about the health facilities that people need being quite far away. As it stands, they could be enormously far away.

That does not apply only to health. In 1993, my local further education college was combined with a college in Watford. Then, all the services at Hemel Hempstead began to be contracted. As a result, there is little FE provision for my constituents, because Watford is too far away. Kids stay on at school doing unsuitable subjects, because the alternatives are non-existent.

The Government say that they want national health service customers to have choice. My constituents want the choice of being treated in their local hospital, not only because it is convenient and gives them a good service, but because as things stand Watford is a hospital in the process of demolition. To move a service from a perfectly functioning hospital with a large number of new facilities to a hospital that is in the process of being demolished is entirely perverse.

If that is the strategy, one should at the very least make the best possible use of the excellent hospital at one's disposal, while perhaps reconfiguring services or doing demolition jobs at the target hospital. Indeed, that is exactly what has happened elsewhere in Hertfordshire in the relationship between Stevenage hospital and hospitals in the Welwyn-Hatfield area. Services have been established at Stevenage to try to ensure that at least Stevenage plays an appropriate role in the transition process, which is anything but finalised and has yet to get even an outline business case.

Why is not Hemel Hempstead playing such a role? The answer is, because we are severely disaffected with the strategic health authority. It wants to ensure that we are brought into line by effectively taking every decision as quickly as it can in what I can only describe as a malevolent way. There is no rational argument here. The language that is used and the advertisements that we are forced to plough through, all have the effect of marginalising the process of rationality.

One of the issues that we have tried to get across repeatedly—utterly unsuccessfully so far, but with the Minister's help perhaps that can change—is the fact that efforts are being made to get a regeneration programme going in Hertfordshire. I have taken a particular interest in that regeneration programme because there is land in my constituency that is in public ownership and not in the green belt. Without any infraction on amenity space it could provide a site for a significant programme of affordable housing for our youngsters and for the next generation.

That land is potentially available and yet whenever we mention that Hemel Hempstead might take some of the regeneration that Hertfordshire is expected to achieve, there has never been any suggestion of trying to improve the health infrastructure to service that enlarged community. That is not because it is not a reasonable thing to request, but because we have a health authority that is entirely unreasonable and deaf to rational argument. When I put those arguments to the strategic health authority board there was a stony silence. When the board asked whether there were any questions, the answer was "No." There were no questions, no interest and no engagement. The response was simply, "Mr. McWalter, you are from Hemel Hempstead. You are out of the loop and the quicker you get out of the room, the better." Well, we are not going away.

There is a desperate democratic deficit in all this. I sat in a room on Monday and people on a top table had the power of decision in these matters. Where was their democratic mandate? I represent a parliamentary constituency. I ought to have a say. But the people who were taking the decision included the chair of the local primary care trust. She voted in favour of these proposals. I think she was leant on somewhat, but I cannot believe that more than 1 per cent. of my constituents would vote in favour of these plans. The main political parties at the next election will all be opposed to them. If somebody stood at the next election on a pro-strategic health authority ticket—a "Consolidate Children's Services at Watford" party—I wonder exactly how many votes they would get. The only votes would be from people who accidentally put their cross in the wrong box. Yet the chair of the primary care trust voted for them and not for the huge majority of people in my area. That is a democratic deficit.

We are also told that the Government will not carry out any major reconfiguring of services. That is bad news for the strategic health authority because it really does not like Dacorum primary care trust. It is the oddball—the one that the authority could not bribe its way to get. I use that term not in the sense of personal benefits but in the sense that when Watford looked as though it would oppose the plans, along came a £330 million development to stuff its mouth with gold and ensure that it came into line. My constituency was never offered that. The reality now is that the strategic health authority has decided that our primary care trust does not need its own chief executive, so it will give us a joint one. Who with? Watford. Where is she based? Watford. There is a de facto joining together of primary care trusts to quieten further the voice of my constituents on these important matters.

Many people in the country are seeing the benefits of having a Government who have had a passion for health and a commitment to improvement, to making an investment in our health services and to changing tack from the story of asset stripping and provision reduction that characterised health in the 1980s and 1990s. That resulted in proposals that all Hertfordshire hospitals should close, that there should be only one and that the system should be much smaller to be economical. We fought off the report proposing that, called "The Right Approach", and we fought off a number of other threats.

This debate is not about the closure of Hemel Hempstead hospital but about service displacement, irrationality, profligacy and an authority that should be much more democratically accountable than it is now. I ask the Minister to review the events that I have described with a view, as I have asked before, to suspending those who treat people in such a way, to inquiring into the falsehoods perpetrated in advertisements and, eventually, to giving us some people whom we can trust to listen to our arguments.

3.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) on yet again securing a debate on this matter. I know that it is of great concern to him and his constituents. I responded to the debate that he secured in December 2003. I have had meetings with him, and my officials and I have studied the reports that he has written in recent months. He has for many years been a fervent supporter of his local hospital and the services that it provides. Whatever else his constituents may have concerns about, they can be sure that they have a Member of Parliament who is tireless in campaigning on their behalf.

Like the people of Hemel Hempstead, my hon. Friend is eager to secure the high-quality health services that any community should expect. That vision is shared by the Department of Health and the local national health service in Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire. I am sorry that he feels that advertisements placed by the strategic health authority have been unfair or misleading. Misleading adverts should not be placed, and I shall be interested to hear the views of the Advertising Standards Authority.

[Dr. Stephen Ladyman]

It is a fact that we need to change if we are to improve. Our health care system is under pressure. Patients are still waiting too long for their operations, and many hospitals are in a poor state and need updating. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The huge amount of money that the Government are putting into health care is driving improvements nationally, including in his constituency, but we still have a lot to do, and those pressures need to be addressed. That has been the case for many years, but we realise that we in Whitehall cannot make decisions about local matters, because we do not know areas as well as local people do. That is why, under our "Shifting the Balance of Power" policy, we pushed decision making down to local areas.

Frankly, across Beds and Herts some health services, particularly the major hospitals, are unlikely to be able to deliver the quality of, and continuous improvement in, care that we expect in England in the 21st century. In West Herts the situation is particularly acute, with the local trust zero star rated. The NHS cannot accept that, and the local NHS is right to demand that it be addressed. That is why there was an initial process to consider changes in health care in the area. That was followed by a formal public consultation known as "Investing in Your Health", which ran from March to December 2003.

Due process was followed in that matter. When local NHS organisations have under consideration a proposal for service change they must comply with the consultation requirements of sections 7 and 11 of the Health and Social Care Act 2001. Section 7 requires the NHS to consult relevant overview and scrutiny committees on service changes that are of a substantial nature. Nobody disputes that the changes described by my hon. Friend are of a substantial nature. Section 11 requires NHS organisations to consult and involve patients, the public and their representatives in the planning and development of services, and in decisions affecting the operation of services.

Following the consultation process, the scrutiny committees had the opportunity to refer the issue to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health for intervention. They did not do so. As a result—I know that this will and does upset my hon. Friend—even if he were able to convince me of his case, I have no basis for intervention in this matter. It was a matter for local determination, and decisions must now remain with the local NHS.

During the consultation period, two options for the future reconfiguration of hospital services were proposed. Both entailed retaining six major hospitals in Beds and Herts, including Hemel Hempstead and Watford general hospitals. As my hon. Friend is aware, option 2 was preferred, which would mean a new hospital at Hatfield with a cancer centre, and development of Watford hospital as a major acute hospital and Hemel as a major non-acute hospital.

I appreciate that that is not the option preferred by my hon. Friend, but this is not about winners and losers; it is about benefits for users of health services across the two counties, and that was the major driver for change. Following on from the consultation process, last April and again in June Department of Health officials reviewed the deliverability of the proposals decided on by the local NHS, and they were satisfied that they were deliverable. In particular, they were satisfied that the two proposed major acute developments could fit on their proposed sites and meet the highest NHS design and space standards; that the proposals were properly costed and likely to be affordable within a reasonable projection of the health community's resources; that the authority had already completed a significant public consultation, in which the proposals were supported by the vast majority of stakeholders—I accept that that does not include my hon. Friend and his constituents—and that the trusts and the strategic health authority understood the challenge of delivering the scheme, and were committed to making the necessary project management resources available.

An earlier peer review by the capital investment unit for the London strategic investment unit formed similar conclusions. As a result, the scheme was approved by Ministers and announced last July. The scheme is now finalising its procurement strategy and recruiting to its project team so that it can develop its outline business case with a view to procurement commencing in 2006 or early 2007, and construction potentially starting in 2009. I want to assure my hon. Friend that under option 2, Hemel Hempstead hospital has a future and will receive investment of around £25 million to develop it into a modern, high-quality major hospital specialising in planned surgery.

I also understand that Dacorum primary care trust is developing plans for the site, including an intermediate care facility and possibly a general practitioner surgery and mental health in-patient facilities. I am assured that Hemel hospital will have more patient contacts than Watford and will continue to play a vital role in health service provision for the people of Hertfordshire.

My hon Friend raised concerns about the children's consultation process. May I state clearly that no decision has been made? I understand that Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire strategic health authority has honoured the commitment given during the "Investing in Your Health" consultation process to talk with local people about how it achieves the services laid out in option 2. I am pleased to note that over the past few months the health authority has been listening to the views of local people on the proposals and important issues, such as the opening times for the Hemel children's accident and emergency unit and the design of the new units.

At a meeting held on Monday, which was open to the public, the proposals on the children's review were unanimously agreed. My hon. Friend might have views as to whether the chairman of the local PCT should have agreed them, but the fact was that they were unanimously agreed. Some of these proposals include a children's rapid assessment unit at Hemel hospital open 12 hours a day, every day, alongside the main accident and emergency department; a rapid referral clinic run alongside the children's out-patient departments at Hemel Hempstead and Watford, offering an alternative to treatment in accident and emergency; a new, specially designed children's day unit at Hemel Hempstead hospital, staffed by specialist children's doctors and nurses and providing planned treatment and surgery; an enhanced community nursing team to ensure that more children could be cared for at home; and a children's in-patient ward at Watford hospital.

I would advise my hon. Friend to get access to the national service framework for children, which we have recently published, and compare the proposals with the best practice that is set out in the national service framework. If he does not believe that the proposals match that best practice guidance, that would provide him with valuable ammunition with which to challenge the proposals.

I also appreciate my hon. Friend's concerns regarding the single chief executive for the two local primary care trusts, but may I remind him once again that that is a local decision for the local PCT trust board? I understand that both PCTs are happy with the current arrangements.

My hon. Friend also raised concerns about transport around Watford hospital. I am aware that a transport and access group, drawn from a range of bodies, is studying how public transport can be improved.

In the final minute available to me, I shall deal with the points made by my hon. Friend in respect of the national position and put them in context. The latest round of revenue allocations to PCTs, covering the period 2006–07 and 2007–08, were announced on 9 February 2005 and represent a £135 billion investment in the NHS over two years. That is equivalent to an average increase of 9.2 per cent. for 2006–07 and 9.4 per cent. for 2007–08—an average of 19.5 per cent. over the two years. As a result of the 2006–08 allocations, Dacorum PCT will receive record increases in funding. For the current three-year allocation period, covering 2003–04 to 2005–06, Dacorum PCT has received a total increase in its funding of over £33 million, which is an increase of 31.8 per cent. For the two-year allocation period covering 2006–07 to 2007–08, the PCT will receive a total increase of £28.2 million, which is an increase of 18.5 per cent.

I realise that that will provide little comfort to my hon. Friend, who will continue to campaign passionately for Hemel Hempstead hospital, and I have no doubt that between now and any political events that may come up in the near future, he and I will be discussing it further. I hope that we will continue this debate in the Chamber after those political events and that his constituents continue to have a wonderful constituency MP who works hard on behalf of the people who put him here and will continue to do so in future.

Subsidised Ferries (EU Regulations)

4 pm

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I thank the Speaker for selecting this important topic for debate this afternoon. I know that other hon. Members who represent Scottish constituencies that have ferry ports will want to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

It is obvious that ferry services are important for islanders. The islands and peninsulas of the west of Scotland have been served for many years by the state-owed Caledonian MacBrayne shipping company, known locally as CalMac. The importance of shipping to the islands is reflected by the well known parody of the 24th psalm.

"The earth is the Lord's, and all it contains, except the Western Isles, which belong to MacBrayne's."

That parody shows how important ferry services are to islanders. They dictate much of island life.

Owing to the small populations on the islands, the CalMac services are viable only because the company receives an annual subsidy from the Scottish Executive. However, because of that subsidy, European Union regulations dictate that those services must be put out to competitive tender. There is no demand from islanders for those services to be put out to tender, but tenders are being forced on the Scottish Executive by the 1992 European maritime cabotage regulations. It is important to note that that demand did not originate in Brussels. It originated much nearer home, from the British Tory Government. That Government held the presidency of the European Union in 1992 and, during the term of their presidency, they pushed the regulations through Europe.

At the start of the British presidency, the then Transport Secretary, John MacGregor—now Lord MacGregor—boasted in a written answer that he would "take forward the increasingly rigorous application of the state aid rules in the transport sector so as to provide for full and proper competition in the single market."

He certainly succeeded in that aim: he drove the regulations through the Council. However, Lord MacGregor clearly did not have a clue what he was talking about because, in the same written answer, he said:

"The anachronism of the United Kingdom and some other member states having their coastal trades open while the rest did not will be ended."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 24 June 1992; Vol. 210, c. 247–248W.]

The written answer made it clear that Lord MacGregor was completely unaware that, within the United Kingdom, Caledonian MacBrayne-operated services were not open to competition. When, as President of the Council, he signed the legislation into law, he seemed unaware of the situation on the CalMac routes. So we have a set of European rules that were foisted on us by a Tory Government who did not have a clue about the reality of ferry services in Scotland.

It is interesting to note that the legislation came into effect on 1 January 1993, yet here we are 12 years later without Britain being compliant with the regulations. During the latter years of the Tory Government, both Secretaries of State for Scotland—now Lord Lang of Monkton and Lord Forsyth of Drumlean—wisely ignored the legislation that their Cabinet colleague had promoted. Even the arch-privatiser, Lord Forsyth, decided that it was a privatisation too far.

[Mr. Alan Reid]

The Commission noticed eventually that the United Kingdom was not complying with the legislation and shortly after the establishment of the Scottish Parliament in 1999, it ordered the Scottish Executive to comply. However, the Scottish Executive have found it difficult to comply with the legislation and, after six years of discussion and consultation, they have still not succeeded in coming up with a workable solution.

It is important to remember that the legislation was designed to open up the lucrative sea routes to holiday islands in the Mediterranean and the Aegean to competition.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for securing the debate. Let us consider the Greeks, for example. Is he aware that, even at this stage, they have not complied? The Italians are still not complying. If the Scottish Executive wanted to use a bit of initiative, they could overcome the problem.

Mr. Reid: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I was not aware that the Greeks were still not complying, although I knew that they had a derogation until 2004.

The measure is completely impractical for the unprofitable routes in the west of Scotland. In the second half of this year, the UK will again hold the EU presidency. My purpose in requesting the debate was to draw the House's attention to how unworkable the proposal is, and, assuming that the Government are still in office and that a certain event does not remove them before then, to ask them to use the power and influence of the presidency to get these unworkable European rules changed, so that the tender does not have to go ahead. A British presidency was responsible for creating this mess; let us make another British presidency bring it to an end.

I now want to turn to why the European rules are unworkable in the west of Scotland context. If left purely to the market, there would be sailings only to the larger islands and in winter, even those large islands would receive a very poor service; the small islands would have no service at all, so a subsidy is clearly necessary. Under the EU rules that means a tender; a tender means a contract and a contract must have a tight specification. That means complete timetable inflexibility for the six years of the contract. Under the current arrangements, no one in the public or the private sector would dream of trying to set a ferry timetable six years in advance, but under these rules, that is what has to be done. Until now, timetables have been reviewed every six months and can be altered as circumstances change. That flexibility will go with the tender.

Six years is the maximum length of the contract that the EU rules allow, but a six-year contract is clearly not long enough to allow the operator to think of the long term and develop the services. The vessels themselves will still be the property of the Scottish Executive, but the operator will be responsible for the maintenance during the six years of the contract. A vessel normally has a working life of about 25 years, but the operator will simply skimp on maintenance and not care what state the vessels are in at the end of the six-year contract. We all know that we look after our own car far better than a hire car, and that is inevitably what will happen in this case.

The European legislation ignores the fact that shipping services comprise many elements: vessels and crews, and land-based infrastructure such as piers and harbours. In order to implement the legislation, the Scottish Executive will be forced to set up a vessel-owning company with the generic name of Vesco and an operating company with the generic name of Opsco. They have to be set up as two separate companies instead of being integrated into one company, as at present. Clearly, that will cause problems.

The piers and harbours are owned by many different organisations, some by CalMac, some by local authorities, some by trusts. A multiplicity of contracts between Vesco, Opsco and the port and harbour authorities will be necessary, which reminds me of the railways fiasco. The situation has been called Railtrack on water and we are heading for the same sort of mess.

Another problem is what happens if the operator, Opsco, goes bankrupt. I doubt if the Scottish Executive will have retained the expertise necessary to step in and pick up the pieces. Any private shipping company asked to step in at short notice will be able to hold the Executive to ransom. After only a few days without a ferry service the islands will start to run out of food and other essential materials.

In order to compete with the private companies, CalMac will be forced to transfer the employment of its crews offshore to avoid paying United Kingdom employers' national insurance contributions, which will cost the Treasury £1 million a year. Under the EU rules, the Scottish Executive cannot insist on the vessels remaining under a UK flag; they can sail under the flag of any EU country. But other EU countries have lower standards for training and expertise of the crews than Britain, so standards will inevitably fall.

In order to enforce a contract it clearly needs penalty clauses for lateness or failure to complete a sailing. However, that also leads to problems. Already, because of the penalty clauses in rail contracts, connecting trains will not wait at the station if the boat is late. We will now be faced with the same situation with the ferries. The boats will not wait for the late trains for fear of the penalty clause.

Inevitably, we will get into a situation when passengers from the train at Oban, say, could even be sprinting along the pier, only to see the captain order the gangway up in order to avoid the penalty clause. To some small islands, the next sailing could be three days later. That is clearly a farcical situation, but it is what we will be faced with under a penalty clause system. A huge majority of my constituents want CalMac to continue to operate these lifeline services. CalMac has its faults—nobody would say that it is perfect—and it certainly has plenty, but a public body can be lobbied and pressurised into making changes, whereas a private sector body will be interested only in conforming to the timetable, avoiding penalty clauses and making a profit.

Crews often live on the islands and are part of the local community. In the small islands, a large proportion of the work force work for CalMac. The crews have a commitment to those islands, whereas a private operator, with crews possibly from the far side of Europe, will not have same commitment to the island communities.

The legislation has already wasted a great deal of taxpayers' money. CalMac has spent considerable sums engaging consultants and has devoted a great deal of time and energy to preparing for the tendering process that would have been better spent improving ferry services.

One of the principles of the European Union is subsidiarity, which is supposed to be about devolving power to local communities. However, the Scottish Parliament is against the tendering, as are the local communities. The Government should back those communities in Europe.

As I have said before, the Tory Minister who was responsible for the legislation had not a clue about the situation in the west of Scotland. He was simply following the "if it moves, privatise it" ideology that gave us Railtrack. Rail privatisation failed. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) wants to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and he will be able to tell the House how these regulations failed the Northern Isles.

It is also interesting to note that the regulations do not apply to buses. European Governments can subsidise buses without the need for competitive tenders. There is no sense in the rules applying to ferries but not to buses. The Scottish Executive could subsidise the bus to Skye without a tender, so why not the ferry to Tiree? There is no logic in that at all.

I have explained all the problems that the regulations will cause. In the second half of this year, Britain will be in a uniquely influential position in Europe through holding the presidency. I urge the Government to use that position to persuade the Commission and the Council of Ministers that it simply does not make sense to enforce the rules in the fragile economies of the peninsulas and islands of the west of Scotland. They were designed for the lucrative Mediterranean, where competition might make sense.

This unwanted legislation could well wreck those economies completely. It was never designed for such a situation. I remind the Minister that even Lord Forsyth shied away from implementing it. I hope that the Government will not support such a privatisation and I appeal to them to do all that they can to end these unwanted and unworkable rules.

4.14 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) on securing the debate and on having presented a detailed and cogent case on behalf of his island and peninsula communities. I know well the importance of such services to his constituents, as I was born and brought up on one of the islands in his constituency, as well as representing an island constituency.

My hon. Friend highlighted a number of the problems that have resulted from competitive tendering. Such problems are well known to us in the Northern Isles because we are one step down from the situation currently faced by the Western Isles. We have had one round of competitive tendering. The tender was called in early by the Scottish Executive and we are now going through the tendering process for the second time. Many of the fears that my hon. Friend outlined today have been well founded in our experience.

The matter to which I wish to bring the House's attention today, and on which I seek Government support, is that in the course of the re-tendering process, we have been told that the EU Commission has decided that state aid rules should exclude livestock transportation, so that livestock is to be treated in the same way as any other freight transport. The impact of that on Shetland farmers and crofters is an increase of up to 50 per cent. in the costs that will be exigible for the transportation of sheep and cattle to mainland Scotland. My farmers and crofters are already operating on exceptionally tight margins, so that will be a critical issue to be resolved in the next few months.

Yet again, I find myself frustrated in the extreme that although state aid rules are intended to ensure open competition, they operate in a narrow, restrictive way that excludes constituents of mine and, I suspect, other peripheral island communities from participating in the marketplace. The European Commission is supposed to operate according to the treaty of Amsterdam, subject to the special treatment of peripherality, as it is called. Island and remote communities can be treated differently, and it is an immense source of frustration to me that that never seems to apply in practice. It is a small point, but I hope that if the opportunity arises for the Minister to support our case, she will do so.

4.16 pm

Mr. Calum MacDonald (Western Isles) (Lab): I should like to congratulate the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) on securing the debate on this important issue, and should like to make two quick points, as I agree pretty much with everything that he said. If it were possible to amend the European regulations, that would be a terrific breakthrough. Can the Minister enlighten us as to whether that is possible?

My first point is that one of the difficulties that people have is not knowing whether the whole tendering process was initiated at the behest of the Commission and forced upon the Government, or less cleverly, whether it was initiated by the Executive themselves. If people could be sure that it was forced on the Government by the Commission, they would not necessarily be happier, but would realise that such matters have to be accepted without breaking the law. Can the Minister address that point and give a reassurance that it is not something that the Government have initiated or rushed into, and that it has been forced on them? If so, that would be welcome.

My second point, which was touched on by the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute, concerns the question of the terms and conditions of employees of CalMac, and its health and safety record, which, we would all agree, is second to none. There is concern that the tendering process will threaten both the terms and conditions of those employees and CalMac's health and safety record. The Minister will know that the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers is currently balloting, trying possibly to call industrial action, and we would all agree that it would be disastrous if that went ahead. It would be helpful if the Minister could give a reassurance that nothing in the tendering process will diminish the continuing commitment of CalMac and the Government to the health and safety record that it has established on the west coast, as well as to the employees' terms and conditions.

[Mr. Calum MacDonald]

4.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) on securing this important debate, and other hon. Members on being here to represent their constituents on this important issue.

Let me first set out the situation, so that hon. Members are absolutely clear about it. Clearly, the Government have not chosen the situation. In terms of UK law, responsibility for transport links in Scotland lies within the devolved sector, by virtue of the Scotland Act 1998. As hon. Gentlemen know, the Department for Transport's Ministers have absolutely no say in what ferry services in Scotland should be subsidised, what the specifications are, or what the balance should be between subsidy provision and revenue from the farebox. Crucially, neither do the UK Government have any financial responsibility for any subsidy provided in Scotland. They are matters for local judgment in Scotland. The Scottish Executive have adequate policy and financial powers to support and maintain the lifeline ferry services.

It is important to make it clear that there is no threat to those services. The Scottish Executive specify the level of service, and will continue to do so. EU guidelines allow alterations to be made to the contract during the six-year period. It is not a matter of setting the level in stone six years in advance and sticking to it throughout. The service pattern can be changed. Neither the Scottish Executive nor the UK Government are, however, free-handed on the method by which such services are procured. Both are strictly bound by the UK's participation in the EU and by what EU policy and practice require.

The hon. Gentleman pleaded with the Government to change the rules, but whether or not we hold the EU presidency—I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for reaffirming his belief that we will be returned to government after the general election, whenever that is—and having said that the Commission has the monopoly and the initiative to make changes, the presidency is a neutral chairmanship and does not have the chance to suggest changes to the regulations. We want to make progress on a range of issues, but an amendment to the regulations does not fall within our ambit.

As hon. Members will know, the EU policy of particular relevance is the single internal market in services and goods and in the movement of citizens and labour. As one would expect, there is a direct application of that doctrine in shipping services, as shipping is pre-eminently a service industry. Most services operating within the EU do so commercially without particular or distorting subsidy. That applies from Finland and Cyprus to Portugal and the UK. Where it is found that the single market is not being correctly applied, the Commission properly investigates and challenges the policies of member states. Where it is not satisfied that specific policies are being applied in accordance with treaty obligations, it is empowered to take member states to court, to seek rectification and to recover any money improperly applied as state aid. All that is inherent in the accession treaty signed by the UK. So we have no choice.

Inevitably, EU policy on the single market is also translated into EU regulation for purposes of enforcement. There is also, however, provision for addressing circumstances in which, exceptionally, shipping services cannot be sustained on a purely commercial basis. These are cases in which everyone agrees that subsidy is necessary and appropriate. In the case that we are examining today, regulation 3577/92 applies as the requirement specific to the supply of shipping services in EU member states.

A basic single-market freedom is the freedom to provide services competitively. That applies in shipping, too. It also applies specifically to the freedom to provide those services in return for a subsidy. As all Members know, article 4(1) is key. It states that member states must impose public service obligations on a non-discriminatory basis in respect of all Community shipowners.

The crucial words are "on a non-discriminatory basis." An exclusive financial arrangement between a subsidy provider, in this case the Scottish Executive, and a service provider, in this case Caledonian MacBrayne, fails the test. With the completion of a single market, other prospective operators of shipping services must have the opportunity to bid for whatever subsidy the public authority considers to be justified. Accordingly, the current arrangements must be replaced by those that comply with regulation 3577/92.

Mr. Carmichael: Does the Minister appreciate my frustration and that of my constituents that, time after time, the regulations are applied in a way that is, frankly, discriminatory? They discriminate against those of us who live in areas that are geographically remote and who rely on such services. As I said, that in itself contravenes the treaty of Amsterdam and the concept of peripherality. Why do the Government never argue that case in Europe?

Charlotte Atkins: As the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute stated, this Government did not negotiate the article. At present, we are stuck with something that was done by the previous Conservative Government. I appreciate the point that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) made that the lifeline services are crucial to his constituency, and the very fact that it is remote indicates that when the tendering exercise does take place it is unlikely that many other companies would want to tender for the services, as they are specialist services. However, we must accept that they have to be subject to a competitive tender.

Mr. Reid: The Minister correctly said that the problem was article 4(1), but surely there must be a mechanism by which European law can be changed. The Government are a big player in Europe. Can they not go to Europe and say that they want the article changed?

Charlotte Atkins: Clearly, that is an issue for the Commission, which is able to initiate the process, and, if that happens, there must be agreement right across Europe. That is the issue. Hon. Gentlemen said that other countries were not carrying out the requirements of the regulation, but the Commission can take action against them, as it can against the UK Government.

The Scottish Executive have made quite a lot of progress with the Commission, which has already acknowledged the special circumstances of ferry services in the Clyde and Western Isles. Indeed, it has indicated that it is content to regard the current bundle of services as the basis of a single contract, and that, instead of cherry-picking, the contract should not be split into individual services for tendering purposes.

The Commission has also accepted the idea of retaining the specialised ships used for these services in Scottish Executive hands, leaving only the operation of the services with those ships as the basis of the contract. It has also accepted the idea of some mainland-to-mainland services forming part of the lifeline services to the islands, and it has offered a de minimis clause for lightly used services below a threshold of 100,000 passengers a year. That package is a tribute to the negotiating skills of the Scottish Executive, but, having conceded all that, the Commission now expect contracting to proceed through open competitive tendering, and we have no powers to change that.

The issue of competitive tendering is still being clarified with the Transport Commissioner, Mr. Barrot. Article 4(1) of the regulation requires the award of a contract on a basis that transparently demonstrates that there has been no discrimination among potential community bidders. How can one do that without having a competitive tender?

Clearly, if there were another way of doing it, we could propose that, but it is difficult to find a way that would ensure transparency. We have a problem, but we must move forward. The Scottish Executive have made progress with the Commission, and I believe that they will be able to take the matter forward. The services will be protected by the work that the Scottish Executive are already doing.

I appreciate that the uncertainty has been of real concern to hon. Members who are in the Chamber today, but it is important that we move forward to ensure that services are provided on a legal basis that we can defend, if necessary.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Four o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 3 March 2005

[MR. JOHN MCWILLIAM in the Chair]

Decent Homes

[Relevant documents: Fifth Report of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister: Housing, Planning, Local Government and the Regions Committee, Session 2003–04, HC 46–I, and the Government's response thereto, Cm. 6266.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Paul Clark.]

2.30 pm

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the Select Committee's report "Decent Homes".

I suspect that this may be our last chance to debate Select Committee reports in this Session, so before I do so, I thank the Clerks who have served on various Select Committees that I have chaired for the past 10 years. I want to put on record my appreciation of all their hard work and all the work that has been done in the Committee offices—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I join the hon. Gentleman in thanking all the Clerks who have served me in all the Select Committees that I have chaired in the past 20 or so years for all their hard work, as this is probably the last chance that I, too, will have to thank them?

Andrew Bennett: Select Committees play an important part in the work of the House of Commons, and the work done by the Clerks in the Committee offices makes all that possible.

I also thank Ben Kochan, the specialist assistant, who has worked hard on a series of reports on housing and planning for the Committee during the past 12 months. We are also grateful to the two specialist advisers, Peter Chapman and John Bryson, who have worked hard for the Committee. Specialist advisers are particularly important because they give up a great deal of their time to give personal tutorials to members of Committees.

Finally, I express my appreciation of the other members of the Committee. Sadly, not many of them are in the Chamber today, but I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) for being here, and for the contributions made by all members of the Committee to the report.

It is a little sad that although we have been bidding for a debate on the report since we published it on 27 April 2004, it has taken us some time to secure one. Sometimes when we produce a report, the Government are very enthusiastic about doing some of the things that we want. The kindest thing that I can say about the Government's response to this report, however, is that it was a very firm thumbs down. I am disappointed, but I understand the Minister's difficulties.

Key to the report were the Committee's congratulations to the Government on setting the target for decent homes and for the very real prospects of achieving it by 2010 in the vast majority of cases. Such an achievement would be considerable. To live in homes that are inadequate saps individuals and families, children in particular.

There are a few caveats. We may achieve the target for most public sector rented accommodation, but I suspect that the Government have set a lower target for the private sector, and that only 70 per cent. of those homes will reach the decent standard met by the rest of the sector. That is a little disappointing, but we are making real progress. I have some sympathy for the Government in that, although it would be nice to install amenities such as a good bathroom, a good kitchen and other facilities in the private sector homes of elderly people, the disruption that that might cause them in the last few years of their lives may be disproportionate to the benefit that they would gain by having those facilities in their homes—facilities from which someone else will benefit.

One major disappointment is that the Government have encouraged local tenants to vote on whether they want their properties transferred to new housing associations—stock transfer companies—or arm's length management organisations, or to stay with the local authority. If people are asked to vote and, having heard all the arguments pressed unfairly to encourage them to transfer to an ALMO or a stock transfer company they still vote to stay with the local authority, it is mean and unfair for the Government to say, "If you vote to stay with the local authority, you're not going to get a decent home because we're not going to let the local authority borrow the money against the future rent income that is necessary to do the work."

There was a glimmer of hope at the Labour party conference, when the Deputy Prime Minister made it clear that he recognised the problem and said that there would be a fourth way, allowing local authority tenants who opted to stay with the local authority to get their houses up to the decent homes standard. Since the Labour party conference, there has been no indication that the Government will put the Deputy Prime Minister's words into practice, and that is disappointing. We will end up with a situation in which people who voted to transfer will almost certainly get a decent home, whereas those who voted to stay with the local authority will be penalised because they had enthusiasm for locally elected, democratic councillor control rather than for the appointment of people on housing association boards.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is making a very important point. Will he explain how he wants the Government to change their policy to ensure that the fourth option is possible? For example, does he think that prudential borrowing powers, which were included in the Local Government Act 2003 for other aspects of capital powers for local authorities, should be extended to housing?

Andrew Bennett: That is certainly one possibility. I find it crazy that, according to the Government, it is perfectly all right for a housing association to borrow money because that money will be repaid from the rents of the properties and the interest paid on it, yet it is wrong for the local authority to borrow money on exactly the same basis, with exactly the same guarantee that it will be repaid.

[Andrew Bennett]

All sorts of nonsense come from the European Union and the Treasury about what counts as public borrowing. It is asserted that public borrowing is somehow bad, but private borrowing is perfectly all right. We should have challenged such nonsense long ago.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): As usual, the hon. Gentleman is making a persuasive case with his fierce criticism of the Minister. I presume that he means that the money that local authorities borrow would be ring-fenced, so that a council would not borrow against its housing stock to spend on other services, but money borrowed against its housing stock would be ring-fenced and then reinvested in housing. Is that the point that he is making?

Andrew Bennett: Very firmly. As I understand it, the housing accounts are already ring-fenced, so it is not a question of councils borrowing money against their housing stock to spend on casinos or anything else. You borrow the money to achieve the decent homes standard in council property that is rented by the local authority—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As a former treasurer, I have not borrowed that money for a great many years—when the hon. Gentleman refers to "you", he is referring to me.

Andrew Bennett: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Let me make it clear that local authorities should be able to borrow money to achieve the decent homes standard for all the stock in their area.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that the biggest problem with the ballots is that there is no constraint on the local authority to spend the moneys that it receives on housing improvements? As the Minister knows, some of us would be much happier if that money was ring-fenced. If local authorities are to have their money ring-fenced for council stock, surely that should also be the case for stock that may go into the private sector.

Andrew Bennett: Yes, I accept that argument. I do not want to spend too long on that subject, however; I just want to make the point that in our report we were disappointed that so far the Government have made no progress in that area.

The Select Committee is very pleased that we have a decent homes standard, but some elements were not perfectly thought out originally; and, although we hope the standard will be achieved by 2010, the emphasis was not quite right. It was a mistake to put so much emphasis on the need for kitchens and bathrooms to be less than 20 years old. I have made the point several times in the Select Committee and in the House. When I am in London, I rent accommodation in the Barbican, which is still council-owned. It was built in the late 1960s and early 1970s, and the standard of the bathroom and the kitchen, which are still the original rooms, is far higher than those being installed as a result of modernisation. The emphasis should be on not the age but the fitness of the kitchen or bathroom.

The decent homes target did not contain enough about energy efficiency. It had nothing about the quality of the estate that people live in. When people are proud of the house in which they live, the front garden—the area around the house—is crucial. Time after time, constituents have told me that they were desperate for housing, but when they were offered somewhere they did not even get inside the front door because they were put off by the appearance of the estate. I am disappointed that there was nothing about the environmental quality of estates in the original decent homes standard.

The final point missing from the decent homes standard is good noise insulation. It is not simply a question of the party wall. Although it is worrying that in too much rented accommodation one can still hear everything that goes on next door, which can be disturbing, often one can even hear everything that is going on in the next bedroom or a room in the same house. Again, that is unsatisfactory, particularly when one has teenage youngsters who need somewhere to study without constant interruption from a younger sibling. Noise standards are important, and they were not in the original decent homes standard.

The Select Committee said that to achieve the standard by 2010 is a good step, but we want a decent homes-plus standard. That is why I am particularly disappointed that the Government said "No way." I understand the difficulty: with two targets, there may be some confusion. However, the Government should consider adding to the decent homes standard, a decent homes-plus standard, and consider especially the question of the quality of the estate. If one wants good tenants who take pride in their property, the quality of their estate and the environment in which they live will be as important a consideration as the quality inside the house. The introduction of the decent homes standard now, with no addition, will create a tendency in local authority housing, stock-transfer housing and housing association property to put too much emphasis on getting things right inside the house, and not enough emphasis on the quality of the estate.

Mr. Davey: I wholly agree with the hon. Gentleman and, as I will say at length later, the report was excellent. However, how does he think the Government can solve the dilemma? They have not managed to do so in their response. One option would be to have a menu of standards from which tenants could choose. There would be no diminution of the Government's long-term target for 2010, but they could give tenants the power to choose the standards that they think are the most appropriate for the next few years.

Andrew Bennett: There is a problem with that suggestion. Under the present procedure, where there is a stock transfer company, in theory the tenants can participate and argue for their priorities. That is not the issue. The problem with housing is that, almost by definition, the person living in the house at the time is reasonably satisfied, so the next tenant to move in is crucial. It is a good thing to have the target of a decent home by 2010, whoever is in the house now. That is why we must have the decent homes-plus standard, which will tell housing associations to ensure that the estate is managed in a way that tenants find attractive and will give them pride in it.

Many decent homes targets cost money, but energy efficiency is a double win because it gives people better comfort in their houses and makes a contribution to reducing greenhouse gases. I cannot understand why the decent homes or decent homes-plus standards cannot include the absolute requirement that soon after 2010, if not by then, measures for all rented stock guarantee the use of as little heat as is necessary to give people a decent standard of comfort. The same applies to noise, although I accept that there is no double win in that respect.

Mr. Drew: I was pleased that care and repair was mentioned. There is a third win. The oldest people usually live in the oldest property, and the third win is that if that property can be well looked after in terms of energy, perhaps people will not get sicker and have to go into hospital. We must pay attention to rehabilitation, and bring health into housing and not leave it merely as a contingency. Does my hon. Friend agree?

Andrew Bennett: I certainly agree. To be fair to the Government, most of the decent homes standards include such things as removing damp and so on. It is important to get the most efficient heating into buildings.

My final point, which is not covered in the present decent homes target, is about turning rented property into what can be described as lifetime homes, which are suitable for people throughout their life: they are easy to manage for those with small children, and for elderly people and people who suffer any sort of accident. It is amazing that there are so many houses where little things are missing—for example, wide doors and a second banister to help people get up the stairs—which, if they were included, would guarantee that if people had an accident, or needed assistance in old age, the house was already adapted to their needs.

I am slightly worried that one of the temptations in achieving the decent homes target will be clearance and demolition. Obviously, if a house is knocked down it does not count as an "indecent" home. I plead with the Government to ensure that when clearance takes place, there is replacement. There is a shortage of rented accommodation throughout the country and thus a temptation for local authorities that cannot let their unpopular, walk-up, deck-access flats to knock them down, creating a space on the council or housing association estate. That is a major problem because it makes shops and other facilities less viable. It often produces a piece of ground that is, theoretically, landscaped but in practice is just a scruffy field on which mischief takes place. As the Government are driving towards the decent homes target, when there is clearance and properties are pulled down, they must ensure that those properties are replaced with the sort of homes that meet the standards and which people want.

I was lucky enough to go the sustainable communities summit and to see some of the ideas that the Deputy Prime Minister has for bringing in new housing. If the £60,000 houses can be built and put into the right place that will be another considerable achievement for the Government, but we must take care that those cheap houses do not become the slums of the future.

I want to mention briefly the stock transfer companies, some of which have done very well. On the edge of my constituency Pioneer Homes has done a remarkable job in turning properties around in Ashton, but most of the housing in Tameside is managed by New Charter of which the best one can say is that it has a rather patchy reputation. To return to the quality of the environment on an estate, I despair of persuading the company to do a little maintenance and repair on the Rose Hill estate, which would be greatly welcomed by the tenants.

In conclusion, we need to make it clear that we will not give up on tenants who vote to stay with local authorities. We will ensure that they get the decent homes target. I do not mind too much how the Government do that, but no one should be penalised for voting for local democracy by being told that they cannot have a decent home. The Government have done well to set the decent homes target, although perhaps there is too much emphasis on kitchens and bathrooms and not enough on making people proud of their estates. Fundamentally, we must recognise that we should create a situation in which a significant number of people can be proud of the fact that they live in rented accommodation and that it reaches the same sort of standards sought by owner occupiers.

2.53 pm

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): As a member of the Select Committee that produced the report, may I begin by echoing the Chairman's thanks to the Clerks and specialist advisers who have served us very well on this and other inquiries? It is also an opportune moment, as it is probably my last chance to do so, to place on record my thanks and those of the other members of Committee to my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett) not merely for the way that he has chaired this inquiry, but for the way that he chairs the Committee in general.

All members of the Committee appreciate how my hon. Friend's chairmanship is genuinely inclusive. We feel part of a Committee, not simply people who come along to sit in meetings and go through an agenda that has already been agreed. He shares with us the formulation of the agenda, the inquiries we should carry out and how we should go about them in a very open way. He involves all of us in the wash-down meetings that we have afterwards to discuss how inquiries are going. He makes us feel a genuine part of what is happening. My heartfelt appreciation and thanks go to him for the way he has chaired the Committee in this Session of Parliament. I know that those thanks would be echoed by other members of the Committee if they were in the Chamber; we all feel very strongly that he has done an excellent job.

I should also like to echo what my hon. Friend said about how much the Committee welcomed the fact that we had a decent homes standard at all. When I first read it in the Labour party manifesto, I wondered whether we were really going to do it and whether it was perhaps a bit ambitious. The Government have set out, for the first time, the right of tenants to a decent home and the fact that resources will be made available to deliver those targets.

[Mr. Clive Betts]

It is a long way from the dark days of the 1980s when some of us had the unfortunate pleasure—I am not sure that "pleasure" is the right word—to go to meetings with Ministers such as Nicholas Ridley to argue about whether the backlog of disrepair in local authority housing was £16 billion, £17 billion, £18 billion, or whatever the latest surveys found it to be. That was disheartening, because we knew that not only were the backlog of disrepair and the level of poor standards enormous—that meant that tenants really suffered from bad housing—but that the problems were getting worse every year because the Government had no intention of doing anything about them. Some of us remember that as the time that the then Government's only housing policy was the right to buy and they focused on that to the exclusion of everything else.

The fact that we now have a target—I shall come on to discuss some concerns about elements of it—embodies a genuine general commitment by the Government to improve the standard of housing as a whole. We should not just be thinking about the issues that are specifically mentioned in the decent homes target, but the wider commitment to carry out repairs to deal with improvements and bring housing up to a better standard.

It has to be recognised that the Government have not merely set a target, but provided resources through the spending of capital receipts. We all know about the promises that the then Minister, Michael Heseltine, made when he said that capital receipts would be ploughed back into local authority housing; we suddenly found that they had been taken off the table and were used to pay off debt, and the houses—apart from 10 per cent. of them—never received any benefit in terms of improvements made to properties in the local authority sector.

We have seen capital receipts, money coming into ALMOs and stock transfer money as well. The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) has temporarily—I hope—left his seat. It would be interesting to hear whether the Conservatives are prepared to commit themselves in the future, if by some mischance they were to win a general election, to keep on trying to deliver decent homes standards. What would their expenditure commitments be in order to do that? Although they have made commitments to carry on with the planned level of expenditure on education, health and the police, some of us suspect that in order to find their £35 billion of cuts, housing would be one of the great losers in that exercise. The decent homes standards and other important investment in housing would go by the board.

Mr. Edward Davey: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman in the absence of our Conservative colleague. I have looked at the Conservatives' expenditure plans in some detail. Is he aware that they want to cut social housing expenditure by £1 billion and that their policy on the right to buy would cost £1 billion a year, as costed by the National Housing Federation? That would leave the Conservatives with a £2 billion gap in their housing budget. Given that fact, does he think that they would be able even to begin to address the decent homes issue?

Mr. Betts: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. Although I do not always agree with the financial calculations of the Liberal Democrat party, I am happy to agree with them fully on this occasion. There would be a major problem not only for a Conservative Government, who would not be very interested in the consequences, but for tenants who found that the money they thought was going to be spent on their homes in the next few years to bring them up to a decent standard would be taken away by a back-door route that had not been spoken about openly and up front.

I shall go on to say a few words about the fourth way in a moment—the Minister would probably expect me to do so—but I have to say that it is now very pleasant indeed, and a genuine pleasure, to go to meetings with tenants and tenants groups. In one meeting in my constituency a few weeks ago, the local area manager, Graham Bows, who previously worked for the council and now works for Sheffield Homes, was able to stand up and say, "I've worked in housing in this city for 30 years"—I have known him well for all that period—"and I can actually get up at meetings now and say it is not a question of whether you're going to get the work done, but when you're going to get it done. Because we have the commitment and the resources from central Government, we can actually talk about timetables for delivery projects, instead of saying 'perhaps if we get something in a few years' time, something might happen', knowing that it probably won't." That is a fundamental change, which also creates a much better relationship between landlords and tenants as they can sit down and plan ahead with the certainty that the Government will actually back what they are trying to do together to deliver improvements to housing.

I was pleased to help shape the policy in Sheffield, which was a novel one of its kind to begin with but has now probably been replicated elsewhere. There is a city-wide ALMO and the local authority still has its homeless responsibilities as well as taking responsibility for allocations, so we do not get competing allocations policies from different parts of the city, which is important. In each area, there has been genuine consultation and tenants have a right to opt in to the ALMO and bring about an area management arrangement for their particular part of the city. In most parts of the city, the tenants have voted by large majorities for that way forward, although, in some parts, stock transfer is favoured by a few estates.

I have to say—I do not know whether the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) will want to intervene on this occasion—that the development of the ALMO model and the fact that the houses remain in the ownership of the local authority was crucial in terms of getting tenants to accept that as a way forward. It was also crucial in helping Labour to win back control of Sheffield city council, because tenants absolutely rejected the idea of the Liberal Democrats that the whole city's housing stock would be put through the stock transfer route. So, there were political implications as well. My colleagues in the Labour group on Sheffield city council are to be commended for the way in which they have gone about the consultation, openly discussed things with tenants and created a model that the vast majority of tenants feel comfortable with. They might have preferred to remain with the council, but, if the model is a second-best option, it is a very good second-best option as far as most people are concerned.

Mr. Chris Mole (Ipswich) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government have made it clear throughout that it was never their intention that one aspect or another of the different models—ALMO, the private finance initiative or whatever—should apply necessarily across the piece in one town, city or area? It would be wrong for any authority leading a discussion on stock transfer to say that one model or another should apply everywhere. The authority should consider the whole of its estate and work out which solution is best for which bit.

Mr. Betts: Yes, that has been the Government's approach. There has always been a strong element of choice, with one unfortunate exception, which I will come to in a minute. It is quite right that tenants should have that fundamental choice about who owns their home. They should not be forced into a change of ownership of the housing if that is not what they wish.

The model is working well in Sheffield, and the area dimension means that there are the benefits of a city-wide board, but also of strong area association. Local people can really get involved in the management of their houses on a scale by which they can have a real influence over what is happening. It is desperately sad, however, that the fourth way has not been worked at a little longer and harder, and a solution reached—for reasons that my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish has already mentioned. When we had the inquiry, there was no evidence at all—if the Minister can produce the evidence, that is fine and I will examine it—that councils are worse landlords than any other bodies, and certainly than housing associations. The Audit Commission believed that to be the case as well, when it gave evidence.

There is no evidence that splitting strategy and management delivers a better housing service. There is a belief, but there is no evidence, as far as I know. I know that Ministers go round saying, "Look at the benefits from the money now coming in." I think that Sheffield's ALMO has just got a three-star rating. The Minister has written to Members to say that he is really pleased with the progress that it has made, and, of course, it has made such progress. However, the ALMO has a lot of money to spend—quite rightly. Therefore, it is almost certainly going to deliver better management with the money that it has compared with what the council had to offer. It is basically the same organisation that runs the houses now. Things have just transferred over.

Given that money for ALMOs does not come outside the public sector borrowing restrictions, giving councils the same money would not have affected the public sector accounts at all. One thing slightly worries me given that, almost uniquely in Europe for a wholly owned arm's length company, ALMO expenditure counts against public sector borrowing. I think that there is only one other country in the European Union—or certainly in the European Union before the accession of the most recent members—where that definition applies. It does not apply in Germany, where arm's length companies of both local authorities and the state do not count when borrowing against the public sector controls. That is one of the ways in which the German Government find their way around the Maastricht criteria. Given that, according to our definitions, ALMO borrowing counts against Government borrowing, if tenants keep on voting for ALMOs in more and more local authorities, is there a danger that, at some point, the money will run out and stock transfer will become the only option? Perhaps the Minister could give some reassurance on that point.

I am grateful for the reassurances that the Minister has given that any review of ALMOs will not entail the possibility of the homes that they manage being transferred out of local authority ownership, because that is a concern as well. I thank him for addressing that. I should certainly like to see the prudential guidelines, which allow borrowing against future income streams in local government services other than housing, to be extended to housing as well. In many cases, that approach would enable local authorities to continue to run their housing stocks. Those issues were never satisfactorily addressed. However, the fact that we have a difference over the fourth way should not cloud the general support for the concept of decent homes and for the Government's provision of extra resources.

I move on to decent homes-plus. I was a little disappointed, because the Government could have had a little more enthusiasm for the concept. We take the point; as we discussed carefully in Committee, we do not want to muddy the waters and say that the current decent homes standard should be increased for 2010. We did not think that that would be helpful; moving targets does not help to achieve them. However, I think that the Government were a little dismissive in saying, "All right—we understand that that is an aspiration, but we are not going to do anything about it at this stage."

The Government could have said that there ought to be a new target in future and that, in the next couple of years, they would start, at least, to consult about what that target should be. If we are to think of a target for 2015, perhaps, rather than for 2020, we ought to set it in, say, 2007. That would be an aspiration. A firmer commitment from the Government would have been appreciated.

When criticisms were made that the standards for thermal comfort were not high enough, the Government said that the current standards were thresholds, rather than the standards to be achieved. Yes, that is acceptable, but if we agreed a decent homes-plus standard, that would be a further target to aim at, even for 2010. It could be looked at every time an improvement to a house was made. I hope that the Government will reflect on that and see the decent homes-plus standard as very useful for the longer term and, perhaps, for raising the standards to which work is done in the meantime.

I shall say a few words about the environment, which is absolutely crucial. One can spend lots of money improving the fabric of a property and its internal amenities. However, the problem is also that of run-down areas where the grass is not cut regularly, cars run over the verges, and there are no trees, a poor standard of lighting and little back alleys where people gather. The Government are now doing something about that.

[Mr. Betts]

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the concerns of a number of us who represent London constituencies—a concern that applies to some other parts of the country as well—is that properties made up of flats, and estates with a very high concentration of flats, have a relative disadvantage because of the amount of money that needs to be spent on communal areas and security upgrades? Very welcome as the decent homes programme is—it is celebrated by tenants in my constituency—that relative disadvantage leaves some of us with such city estates in our constituencies to face a struggle.

Mr. Betts: I absolutely accept that, and there are such flats in my constituency. If there are security issues for those flats as well as issues of the general environment, the green environment and the roads, dealing with them will involve additional expenditure. If that is not spent, much of the other money spent on the internals of a property will almost be wasted. People would just give up. If an area is run-down and people do not feel secure, tenants will not feel great commitment to the properties. That is also true in the private sector. Estate agents use the phrase "Location, location, location" to describe whether they can sell a house easily and whether it will be an attractive proposition to buy. The phrase is also true for rented property, and we ought to take the environment issue very seriously.

The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but my understanding is that when an ALMO is created, about 5 per cent. of the funds allocated can be spent on the environment. That is not sufficient in many cases. Stock transfer can raise an awful lot more money, but there is a real problem. I know that neighbourhood renewal and other sources of funding can be brought to bear to create sustainable communities, but the Government should look at the issue. Expenditure on the homes would be even better and more worth while if another 5 per cent.—or more in estates with flats—were allocated for the environment around the homes. That is a real issue, which has been raised with me by Sir Bob Kerslake, chief executive of Sheffield city council. He says that that is one of the downsides of the ALMO compared with stock transfer. That issue needs to be addressed.

I shall just say a few words about the private sector. We are still in an inadequate position, particularly as regards the private rented sector. I understand the differences with owner-occupied properties, but tenants in the private rented sector have as much right to a decent home as people in the local authority and socially rented sectors.

On the 70 per cent. target, if the Government had said, "Well, it's 70 per cent. because we know it's much harder to get there in the private sector, but our aspiration is still to get to 100 per cent. and we'll get there by, say, 2015," we could understand that 70 per cent. was a stepping stone along the way. However, to have 70 per cent. as an absolute target, and then to have it for only 70 per cent. of the private homes occupied by the most vulnerable people on benefits is not as worth while as the target of 100 per cent. for the socially rented sector by 2010. I do not know whether we should have a target that a house may meet one day but not the next, because the circumstances of the person in the house change, or because the people themselves change, and so are no longer in a vulnerable group. I am not sure how meaningful it is to combine the circumstances of the individual tenant, in terms of their income, with a target related to the fabric of property. The mixing of the two creates a moveable target that is difficult to monitor.

If we are to be a bit braver about what we are doing with the private rented sector, we will need a few more enforcement mechanisms. It is quite right that there should be enforcement mechanisms in the private sector, but they do not cover all the issues covered by the decent homes standard; that is another issue that we raised in our report, and I was not absolutely convinced by the Government's response on it.

I hope that we have produced a good report for debate. We are very supportive of the Government's overall intentions, the extra money that has come into housing and the higher priority given to it. We have one or two concerns, and although we probably will not make progress on the fourth way after the arguments that we have had on it, at least matters such as decent homes-plus, how we address the environment and problems in the private rented sector are issues that the Government might care to reflect on further. I hope that we can make a little more progress on them.

3.12 pm

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Lab): Every week in Tower Hamlets I visit homes where people become ill because their housing falls below a decent standard. What does that mean? It means damp, cold, overcrowded conditions. Those people cannot decorate their homes because the paint will not stay on the walls. They cannot stay warm in their homes because they do not have central heating, or in some instances because the windows appear to be open holes. They cannot socialise in their homes because there is simply no room for that. Thousands of constituents have implored me to come to see their homes to see the beds in the living room or the cot in the bath, and to see that they do not, in their view or mine, have a decent home or even a decent family life.

It is not surprising that so many people in Tower Hamlets have such a harrowing experience with housing. In England, 33 per cent. of households live in non-decent homes, 22 per cent. of which belong to social landlords. In Tower Hamlets, 70 per cent. of housing stock falls below the decent homes standard. Last year, the figure was 75 per cent., so in one year there has been a 5 per cent. improvement in the number of homes meeting the decent homes standard. The Government must be commended on that. It has happened for specific reasons: because they have put more money into social housing, and because of a combination of repairs to older homes and new build programmes that would not be taking place without that extra Government investment.

My concern is not just about the homes falling outside the definition, however; it is also about a number of important aspects that have been left out of the definition. In my view, it is critical that the decent homes standard includes the communal areas, which we have heard about, and the quality of the estate. A home will not be viewed as decent if someone has to step over broken syringes and excrement to get to their front door. These issues of security are among the most important that tenants flag up as allowing them to believe that they have a decent home. Their homes are not decent if they do not have the level of protection given by a decent infrastructure around them.

Ms Buck: Does my hon. Friend agree that last year's 3.4 per cent. increase in London's regional share of the management and maintenance allowance was indisputably welcome, but is a cause for concern when compared with the 13.9 per cent. increase for the whole country? Will she join me in asking our right hon. Friend the Minister to reconsider the regional allocation of the funds?

Ms King: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. She has raised one of the most important issues, which I will discuss in a moment.

I was talking about the state of estates, which is reflected in the money available to spend on them. I am concerned that lift maintenance also falls outside the decent homes standard. The lives of people in Tower Hamlets are ruined, and pensioners and parents with young children are literally made prisoners in their homes when the lifts do not work, but that has not yet been taken into account. The cost for Tower Hamlets to service lifts on its estates between now and 2010, which is only five years away, is £26 million. That reflects the fact that more than 12,000 properties—more than a quarter of all our housing stock—are in lifted blocks of at least six storeys. None of that money counts towards decent homes, yet it is pivotal to the creation of decent homes-plus, as we have heard. The Minister has been extremely helpful to many of us in arguing the case against deprivation, overcrowding and the social exclusion aspects of housing, and I ask him to consider what has been left out of the decent homes standard, particularly in relation to communal areas, security and lifted blocks.

As I said, the Minister has been very helpful about overcrowding, but so far as I am aware—he will correct me if I am wrong—solving the problem of overcrowding is not part of the Government's decent homes agenda. In other words, a one-bedroom flat is perfectly decent if one person is put in it, but not if a family of eight is put in it. Tackling the problem of overcrowding is therefore fundamental to attaining the Government's decent homes standards.

Ms Buck: This will be my last intervention. Does my right hon. Friend the Minister accept that some registered social landlords are under pressure to meet the targets of the decent homes initiative and to develop stock to address housing problems such as homelessness and overcrowding? The Peabody Trust, for example, has its own financial problems and is disposing of up to 1,000 street properties at a time of overcrowding and unmet housing needs, so meeting the decent homes obligations will, in some ways, undermine its capacity to meet housing needs. Perhaps he will be kind enough to consider ways of resolving these problems, so that RSLs do not dispose of street properties in particular, which are usually of a size that can meet the requirements of the families about whom my hon. Friend is talking.

Ms King: Many of my constituents would also be grateful to hear from the Minister what further steps the Government are taking to tackle the problem of overcrowding, which blights the lives of so many families in Tower Hamlets. My hon. Friend makes a very important point about housing association stock. I will return to that point in a moment.

I said earlier that I would come back to the maintenance issue. The single biggest cause of poor quality housing is lack of maintenance. The communities plan includes £2.8 billion to bring council homes up to a decent standard, and that is greatly to be welcomed. None the less, that must be set against the £19 billion backlog that was inherited in 1997—a backlog of disrepair and underinvestment. The Government have said:

> "Our new rates of funding improvements in the management and maintenance of the council stock will mean support will be £500m higher in 2005–06 than would have been the case."

However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) pointed out, the overall changes to the management and maintenance allowance that have occurred mean that, although the average increase is about 13 per cent., some areas with the worst housing have received a lower percentage. In London, for example, which has the highest number of children living in poor quality housing, we have had a fraction of that amount. It is strange that the Government should not recognise the need in areas that have some of the lowest income families and some of the worst social housing—some are in London and some in the north. In my view, simply to ignore the situation in London seems absolutely desperate.

In Tower Hamlets, much of the new money that the Government have invested is making differences that people can see. People will not necessarily believe what politicians say, but they do believe their own eyes, and they are seeing new homes being built today in Tower Hamlets. In that context, I want to mention the quality of new build. Constituents have complained to me about the lack of noise insulation, and such issues seem to be storing up problems for the future. There are also issues related to energy efficiency. I cannot think of a worse way to save money than by not investing in energy efficiency.

The last thing that I want to say brings me back to my first point—the quality of estates. In Tower Hamlets, a lot of money is being invested in improving the overall built environment, not only with bricks and mortar, but by putting in place local area partnerships involving all the organisations. That means working with local authorities; with the police on safer neighbourhood schemes; with the schools to get extended school areas; and with health authorities to set up new health facilities on estates near to the people who need them. Such measures are improving the quality of life in Tower Hamlets.

The Government must look at the omissions from the decent homes standard, however, which could reduce the effectiveness of their programmes in other areas.

[Ms King]

Can the Minister tell me what further measures the Government will take to improve the quantity of housing stock available in areas such as Tower Hamlets, particularly in relation to what we heard earlier about affordability and low-cost home ownership? We have heard the Government's proposal for a possible £60,000 house for first-time buyers. In Tower Hamlets, the average house price is about £250,000 and the average income is about £12,000. That £12,000 figure takes into account people in Canary Wharf, for example, many of whom earn a lot more. One can therefore imagine how low the incomes of many of those families are. Will he also consider increasing the number of people from lower income groups that have access to decent homes through some of the shared home ownership schemes?

Mr. Hayes: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Lady's flow, but she will be aware that investment in low-cost home ownership has plummeted since 1997. Housing Corporation support for the scheme, which she will know was established under the previous Conservative Government, has been steadily reduced. There are now 60,000 applications a year for the scheme, 50,000 of which are disappointed, because the Government have failed to support it. That even allows for the key workers scheme.

Ms King: Obviously, while I will consider the point made by the hon. Gentleman, it makes me almost have an apoplectic coronary heart attack to hear Conservative spokesmen talking about access to homes in a place such as Tower Hamlets, where few new homes of any description were built during 18 years of Conservative government. The issue of home ownership has been examined in Tower Hamlets and the key worker schemes there seek to address it. My point is that the threshold to access such schemes should be brought within the reach of people on average and below average income. Currently, they are not brought to that level; they are nowhere near it.

My specific request to the Minister is about making home ownership genuinely affordable. For example, £60,000 would be affordable these days for someone earning £16,000, given the increased ratio between salary and mortgage, as opposed to the 1:3 ratio that prevailed when I and other people bought their homes. Will he consider making more decent homes available to people on lower incomes through shared ownership schemes?

3.27 pm

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): I congratulate members of the Select Committee on producing one of its best reports during this Parliament. It might be that reports get better as a Parliament progresses. The Chairman, the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett), and his colleagues have done an excellent job in analysing this important part of housing policy.

The decent homes standard is on the face of it a reasonable objective. One cannot have any criticism of the objective of wanting to ensure that the housing stock, particularly the social housing stock, is brought up to scratch. In their constituency surgeries, most MPs will come across housing problems week in, week out; they will come in many shapes and forms, but the quality of homes is a big one.

There is no disagreement with the Government about the need to improve housing standards. The question is whether the decent homes standard is the right way in which to do that. It has had some advantages. It has helped to focus the minds of the housing associations and people in local authorities, and ensured that they were at least thinking about how they could marshal resources to make improvements. It has had that effect, but has it gone much further?

It is interesting that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish earlier in his arguments focused on the fourth option, and that was picked up by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts). We are ultimately talking about the cash that is available for improving the housing stock. We all know that successive Governments have examined different ways of trying to ensure that the housing capital investment was kept off the balance sheet; we understood about the huge backlog.

The huge backlog goes back to the plans of the then Conservative Opposition, which were put together by the noble Lord Lawson, for the 1979 Conservative Administration. It was clear—and this can be read in his memoirs—that they intended to cut back on housing investment. It was their No. 1 strategy for saving money in the early Thatcher years. That continued for a long time and built up the huge backlog.

We all know that whatever the option is—an arm's length management organisation, a stock transfer, a public finance initiative, or whatever—it is all about getting that huge backlog put right. We understand that the Government want to do that by making it not appear on the balance sheets. However, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe made clear, that is in many ways an accounting exercise, not a real one. I share the concerns that he and other Labour colleagues raised. The Government must look at a fourth option; indeed, they must look at a fifth option, as many more options exist than those currently on the table.

For example, we could consider the idea of creating mutual housing associations, in which the tenants had not just a vote but control and membership of the housing association. That would be a very different model from a simple stock transfer, and would be attractive to many communities. The Government must unlock themselves from their limited options to see whether there are other ways of creating the cash that is needed to improve homes.

As the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish said, there are some real problems with the decent homes standard. I am concerned that the Government are approaching the matter in a narrow-minded way. They are not saying, "Hold on a minute, we set those standards a few years ago. We were wrong: there is clear evidence that we were wrong. Let's change them." I can say, for myself and on behalf of my colleagues, that we would not criticise the Government if they changed the decent homes standard in a sensible way—if they looked at what was happening and decided to adjust it. That would be a sensible thing to do, and I hope that the Conservative spokesman can give that pledge as well.

One point that the report set out well was the need to take account of everything—not over-investing in replacing kitchens and bathrooms that are not out of date; modern standards, such as ensuring that thermal criteria, noise insulation and materials are right; neighbourhood standards and—something that has not been mentioned today—access for elderly and disabled tenants, tackling the life homes standard within the decent homes standard. There is space to do that.

The question is, if the standard is to be changed in the sensible ways that are set out, how will that be done? That is why I intervened on the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish. In the report, the Committee deals with that question by saying that the standard is not perfect, so we must change it. It comes up with a new standard, decent homes-plus, which makes sense and certainly meets some of the criticisms. However, the Government's response is fairly weak on that point, and I hope that the Minister can say a little more about it. When dealing with the set of recommendations relating to decent homes-plus in their response to the report, the Government could only say:

"ODPM's implementation guidance encourages social housing providers to engage with tenants at a local level and, where appropriate, provide enhanced local solutions—a 'Decent Homes Plus', which may address many of the Committee's concerns."

I have to say that that is one of the weakest replies I have seen in a Government response to some pretty well-argued and stringent criticism.

The Government must go further. I was trying to press the Chairman of the Select Committee on how the Committee wanted to approach decent homes-plus. Clearly, it would mean more money. Let us not beat about the bush; if standards are to be improved over a similar timetable, the cash has to come from somewhere. He said two interesting things. He suggested that energy efficiency would save money in the long term. That is a fair point, although I am not sure whether the Chancellor will be quite as impressed when he plans the spending review and annual expenditure limits. He also said that, in his view, there should not be any choice about the matter, and that the standard existed because we were worrying about future tenants, not existing tenants. I want to take him up on that point, because if we are to push the decent homes standards further and improve the number of criteria that will be counted in it, we must be realistic about the public expenditure implications, and what can or cannot be afforded.

Even if there were a fourth or fifth option, would there be the cash to meet a decent homes-plus or decent homes-plus-plus standard, whatever it is called? The best way—the only way—to deal with the dilemma of budget restraints and the desire that I am sure is shared across the House is by empowering the tenants and asking them what is most important for them and their estate.

Mr. Hayes: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's observations. Of course, the Select Committee itself said that—the Chairman of the Committee is probably mentioning it to the Minister as I speak. The report makes it clear that tenant involvement, not just at the consultation level but at the management level, in real decisions about the future of the estate, is a central task in improving standards such that people are comfortable with them.

Mr. Davey: That is right, but the Committee and certainly the Government are not taking the logical next step. If money is available under whatever option, surely the housing provider should say to the tenants, "There is money to improve your homes and a range of things that we could do. Tell us which you prefer. We cannot do everything at once, but you are the tenants, these are your homes, you live there. What do you think is best for the community?" The process will not be easy, as some tenants will want one thing and others will want another thing. It may be difficult to manage, but it will empower the tenants.

As the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe said, the great thing is that money is available. He spoke about meeting tenants who were satisfied that things were happening, but he described that in an interesting way. He said that the housing managers were able to go to meetings and tell tenants that something was going to happen. I want housing managers up and down the country to go to meetings and say, "Tenants, these are the options, this is the budget, how should it be spent?"

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way a second time. I am not unsympathetic to the case that he is making, but I have two questions. First, does he envisage that the outcome of that consultation process and involvement would be an aggregate result? If the general view of the tenants was that they wanted the neighbourhood cleaned up, more trees planted or more graffiti removed, would housing managers go with that, even if it were not everyone's view? Or, if the hon. Gentleman envisages every individual request being met, how would that be done?

With your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the second question is about choices made by this generation of tenants that would not be the choices of the next generation. How would the hon. Gentleman handle the problem of someone saying that they would like something changed in their home that the incoming tenant would not feel is a priority or appropriate?

Mr. Davey: On the second issue, I do not have a crystal ball, and it would be difficult to imagine such a situation. That is why I was not totally convinced by the answer to my intervention on the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish. We should ensure that the existing tenants, who probably know their homes and communities better than anyone else, are driving the investment.

The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings said that there may be some tension between the individuals who want investment in their own property for whatever reason and those who want investment in the community. Of course, there will be tension, and, ultimately, someone will have to take the decision. However, I do not understand why the menu cannot be put to the tenants so that they can discuss among themselves what the priority is. As we have heard, kitchens and bathrooms are often of adequate standard, and they would probably be the same for most of the estate. If that were the case, tenants would not go for that but would go for something else such as energy conservation measures or a new playground for the children.

[Mr. Davey]

Andrew Bennett: I think that the hon. Gentleman is missing the point. The purpose of the inquiry on decent homes was to set a minimum standard. As far as the Committee is concerned, the decent homes-plus standard is also intended to set a minimum standard, not to say to tenants that there is a menu of things from which they can choose. It is important to raise the standard of housing in general.

I just put a caveat to the hon. Gentleman about consulting tenants. One of the early inquiries of the Select Committee had to do with empty homes, particularly abandonment in the north of England. During that inquiry, we visited some houses in Harpurhey. More than £80,000 was spent on each house to make it exactly what the tenants wanted. The problem was that, although that was what the people who lived in the houses when the investigation was done wanted, a lot of those people moved away during the modernisation and many did not come back. We must ensure both that housing, particularly in this sector, reaches those standards, and that what is done will suit other people as well as the existing tenants.

Mr. Davey: I do not think there is much difference between us. All that I am saying is that if the hon. Gentleman and his Committee want to ratchet up the minimum, that will have to be paid for. That money will not come all at once; however generous the Government prove to be, there will not be a slug of money so that all the necessary work can be done over the next two or three years. The works will have to be timetabled. All that I am asking is why not involve the tenants in deciding on the timetable for reaching the minimum standards, so that they can choose what is most important to them?

The hon. Gentleman makes a point about future tenants. I am not saying that they should not be taken into account, or that whatever the original tenant wants should be done. That could result in perverse decisions being made, as he implies—perhaps that was the case in the community that he mentioned. The Committee came across examples of where the decent homes standard had produced a lot of investment but the tenants on whose homes the money had been spent were not happy. That is nonsense. All that I am arguing is that we should try to invest the money in the tenants' top priorities. That would produce a better long-term outcome for the tenants, the future tenants and the taxpayer.

Andrew Bennett: In practice, I think that that is happening. If I gave the impression that the area manager I referred to was standing up to tenants and saying, "This is what we will do for you," that is not right. He was saying that they now have the money to do things, but Sheffield has had a long history of tenant involvement in area committees and area budgets, and, uniquely, of a tenant levy that helps fund local tenant associations. The decent homes standards are a benchmark or framework, within which lots of important improvements—such as replacing windows, which is a top priority in my constituency—go ahead at the tenants' request.

Mr. Davey: I am sure that that is the case. We cannot generalise about housing. We all know that local authorities or housing associations undertake different projects using very different approaches. It happens even within our constituencies. Housing is very varied, and I am sure that there are councils and registered social landlords who are producing best practice.

In my constituency, two attempts have been made in the past 15 years to persuade tenants to vote for stock transfer in order to get a huge amount of money invested in social housing in Kingston. Both attempts have failed—most recently last year, and by quite a large majority. That leaves us in a dilemma, because the Government are not providing a big slug of money to local authorities to help council tenants such as those whom I represent. My tenants want to stay with their local authority because it is a good authority, but now it does not have sufficient cash. It is looking at a range of schemes—such as arm's length management organisations and private finance initiatives, or other smaller-scale stock transfer—to see if it can meet the decent homes standard, but it is in a real bind. Council tenants who come to my surgeries frequently say, "We need this extension or adaptation, but the council says it does not have enough money." It is difficult to reply, "Well, you voted no." Just because they exercised their democratic right and voted no does not mean that they should be excluded from having a decent home.

The Minister must address that fundamental question. A few months ago, some disturbing rumours were going around that the Government intended to address it by deciding that tenants who voted against stock transfer would be outside the decent homes standard. I hope that he can put it on the record today that that is not the case, and that the fact that tenants vote no does not mean that they are not entitled to have a decent home, or that the Government will not help them have one by 2010. It would be extremely helpful if he were to put that on the record, because then I could say to my constituents who are council tenants, "The Minister has today promised me that you will have a decent home by 2010." I look forward to his doing that and ensuring that the Chancellor and the Deputy Prime Minister provide that cash.

The Committee made an important point about the private sector in its report, and although it mentioned the Housing Act 2004 it did not say much about it. I was slightly surprised about that. However, the Act is a crucial lever. The report refers to the need for environmental health officers and to giving local authority departments the money to enforce the new standards. Will the Committee Chairman say how he thinks that the 2004 Act can help deal with that?

Andrew Bennett: First, we produced a fairly comprehensive report on the draft Bill in 2003. I should remind the hon. Gentleman that we took the evidence for the report in spring last year and published it in April, at which point the 2004 Act was still being fought through in Committee. We were hoping that some significant improvements would come through in the end.

Mr. Davey: I accept those points, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that my colleagues and I worked hard to get those improvements to the 2004 Act—the empty property management orders and tenancy deposit schemes. I hope that those new powers will be a major improvement in the private sector, and that the Government will go further.

During our debates on the 2004 Act, it emerged that the one thing that the Government had not addressed was how to improve the professionalism of landlords. That is difficult to deal with. There are some professional landlords with large portfolios of rented accommodation of varying standards, many of whom are very good. Some companies manage large portfolios. A multitude of landlords—tens of thousands of people—manage one or two properties. The trick in trying to improve the quality of the private rented sector is not simply to impose more regulations, as welcome as those in the 2004 Act are, but to improve the professional qualifications, training and advice that is open to private landlords.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman has now moved on to a different, important area. Does he agree that that is much more likely to be achieved by self-regulation, and that some of the regulations are necessary, but the burden of regulation faced by landlords has been unhelpful? We should be moving towards more self-regulation, to raise the standards in the way that the hon. Gentleman talked about.

Mr. Davey: I am slightly surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman say that, because I remember having many debates with him in the Standing Committee on the Housing Bill and there was, through most of our discussion, a genuine agreement that the Government were taking sensible regulatory steps forward.

We Liberals said, "No further. Go as far as is proposed, see how the measures work and whether they can be enforced properly and then review the situation." We decided that, rather than impose further regulation, we should work with the landlords while we waited to see how the regulation worked and what, in the light of professionalism on the landlords' side, was the next step and the best way forward.

Mr. Hayes: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood me, or perhaps I did not make myself sufficiently clear. He is right about the latest tranche of regulations, but there is a cumulative effect, because landlords are regulated and controlled in all kinds of ways. I am concerned about the cost and disincentives of that cumulative burden. He is right about our attitude towards the recent tranche of regulation, but does he agree that eventually regulation will become intolerable for many landlords and may have a damaging effect on the sector?

Mr. Davey: If the Government continue to return with more regulations, the hon. Gentleman may be right. They should not do that. We should see how this completely revamped system beds down and how we can help landlords improve standards more generally.

I do not want to say much more. The decent homes standard has been a welcome programme, and the report shows how it can be improved. I only hope that the Government think again about their reaction to the report. Whether we are talking about the fourth option or the definition of the decent homes standards, their response was inadequate. In many ways, the Chairman of the Committee, while making some fierce criticisms, was understating his concern and the Committee's. Certainly I thought on reading the report that there was a real chance for the Government to make amends and to go forward. I hope that the Minister will tell us today that the Government's response to this very good report can be considered again.

3.50 pm

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): As ever, I draw attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. Also, as this may be the last time that the Minister and I clash across the Chamber, let me say how much I have enjoyed our exchanges, discussions and debates. They have never really been arguments. As Oscar Wilde said, arguments are always vulgar and often persuasive. The arguments between the right hon. Gentleman and I are never vulgar, and mine are usually more persuasive than his, but it has been a pleasure. I hope that this is not the last occasion on which we cross swords, but it may be.

The hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King)—we must not forget Bow, certainly not with an election in the offing—made an important point about housing availability and affordability, and about house building. It would be wrong to debate decent homes outside that context, because one of the greatest indictments of the Government has been the collapse of social house building. That is a damning indictment of this Government and this Minister.

Hon. Members will be as acutely aware as I am of the facts. I have the table here that shows that in the mid-1990s we were building just under 40,000 new social houses a year, but in recent years we have built just under 20,000 each year, so there has been a collapse in social house building under Labour's stewardship. That has created a significant problem in the form of the number of people housed in temporary accommodation. I know that it is a cause of great distress to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as it is to me that the number of such people has reached a record 100,000, according to ODPM figures from December. That is the highest the number has ever been.

It is true that Governments have often inherited a rising trend when such figures have been announced. It is sometimes true that people make cheap political points because a figure has been reached when in fact the trend was established under a previous regime. However, the trend for people housed in temporary accommodation was falling until 1997. The Government have reversed a falling trend, and we now have that appalling figure, so there is a real problem with social house building to which the hon. Lady was right to draw attention. I shall deal with that issue and affordability before coming to the comments of the Chairman of the Committee and of the Committee itself.

Mr. Betts: I just want to get things straight. Is the hon. Gentleman saying on behalf of the Conservative party—I am sure that he would like to confirm this—that under its spending plans, a Conservative Government would remain committed to the decent homes standard and all the funding associated with it, and would also provide extra resources to build even more social homes, which he says are needed?

[Mr. Betts]

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's remarks. I shall come to our position on the decent homes standards in the middle part of my extremely long and interesting speech. To deal with his other point, our position is crystal clear. I know that he takes to bed every night—as you do, Mr. Deputy Speaker—the Conservative action on housing pamphlet, "The Right to Own", which I published at the end of last year. That pamphlet makes it clear that if the Housing Corporation's approved development programme were divided 50:50 between houses to rent and low-cost homes, as the hon. Lady suggested, there would be about 12,500 more homes built each year—a combination of Housing Corporation homes to rent and new houses built under the low-cost home ownership scheme.

We know that 60,000 people apply for that scheme every year and that the vast majority of them are disappointed. Among the generality of the population, we know that, according to independent surveys, about 85 to 90 per cent. of people want to be home owners. Our target should be ambitious. We have changed the proportion of people who own their own home over the past 25 years from about 60 per cent. to 70 per cent., so why should we not aim, on a non-partisan basis, to change that proportion over the next 20 years from 70 per cent. to 80 per cent. by reconsidering shared equity?

The way to make home ownership accessible is not by building "affordable houses", but by making the houses that best suit people's needs affordable to them as individuals and families. That requires a fresh look at equity. I echo the plea of the hon. Lady for real effort to be put into invigorating the mortgage market and for Government support for shared equity homes, so that people can take that first step on to the ladder; it is a question of bringing the ladder closer to them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I disappoint the hon. Gentleman and say to him that my bedtime reading is much more likely to be J. P. O'Brian or Bernard Cornwell than the particular volume that he referred to?

Mr. Hayes: I am cut to the quick; I never thought for a moment that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would place anyone above me in terms of your reading preferences, but I stand corrected.

Andrew Bennett: I understand why the Conservative party is hung up on the idea of home ownership, but perhaps the reason why more people appear to have wanted to buy their own homes is the poor quality of rented accommodation. When we have good quality rented accommodation and estates, a lot of people may see the advantages of rented accommodation. Home ownership has not been the greatest of things in one or two northern cities where house prices have steadily fallen rather than risen as in the rest of the country.

Mr. Hayes: I hope that I am not being impertinent in asking the hon. Gentleman whether he lives in his own home or rents.

Andrew Bennett: I have bought my house and it has been a fantastic investment, but the success of such an investment involves choosing the right area to live in and the property prices rising. Home ownership is not necessarily good for society. I will probably have a huge amount of money tied up in my house when I die, and my kids will no doubt be pleased with that. I suspect, however, that as far as I am concerned, it might have been better if I had been renting during the later years of my life and had had the money to spend.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman explain which bit his kids will be pleased about?

Andrew Bennett: Both, I think.

Mr. Hayes: You are on impeccable form today, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if you do not mind me saying so. We are ranging widely from your preferred reading matter to the hon. Gentleman's life story.

The fact that the hon. Gentleman chose to buy his own home, as I suspect most Members here today have done, is perhaps indicative of a natural human desire to acquire a property and pass it on to the next generation. That is not unhealthy. Associated with the acquisition of property are many other good things such as security, responsibility and a stake in society, but he is right that that is not to say that we should either reject those who need to rent or neglect the quality of the properties that they rent.

My analysis has revealed that, unsurprisingly, most people's housing needs change in their lifetime. We start off single, we often—perhaps usually—get married or find a partner, to use the modern idiom. If we are fortunate, we have children, and we then get old and end up—I hope not too soon—rather dependent. I started off living in a council house on a high-quality council estate. It was an idyllic childhood—a golden age, one might say. I was a tenant in the private rented sector when I was a student, then I had a small private house, then a big private house, and now I have a very big private house. One day I will move into a bungalow, and perhaps I will end up dribbling while being fed in a supported home. That is not an unusual pattern. People's housing needs change, and the houses available to them must reflect those changing needs.

The hon. Gentleman is right: there is a proper role for the rented sector, both private and public, and it is necessary that property is available in sufficient quantity and quality. That is really the subject of our debate: there clearly is not sufficient quantity at the moment. The number of social houses being built is not adequate to meet demand. My point is that, over a very long period, by adopting policies such as looking again at equity, we may change demand by altering the proportion of the population who own and therefore the proportion who want and need to rent. That is a perfectly reasonable ambition, given that most people say that that is what they want to achieve. Why should we not help people achieve their aspirations?

The Government are on weak ground in this debate in terms of their record on social house building. That could be altered if we adjusted the way in which the Housing Corporation funds the construction of new homes and if, as I have said, that funding was weighted more heavily towards the development of shared equity homes under low-cost home ownership schemes. I am more than happy to make those figures available to the Minister—I am sure that he has them—and other hon. Members, so that they can share my disappointment with him and his record.

The Government have said that the reason why they have not built many social homes is that they have chosen to prioritise investment in existing stock. They have a fair argument: that we have the oldest housing stock in Europe and that some of our public sector housing is not of sufficient quality. That is the case for all kinds of reasons.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way and apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for arriving late.

Would the hon. Gentleman consider the £19 billion backlog of disrepair caused by the previous Government to be part of that argument?

Mr. Hayes: I was about to say—with typical generosity—that one reason why we face a challenge is the policies of a range of previous Governments on maintaining housing stock. If one considers housing stock, one must consider a long period, because houses do not deteriorate in 10 or 15 years; their condition changes gradually over a long time. To be fair, the problem partly results from the age of our housing stock, particularly in the public sector. Large amounts of public sector housing were built between the wars—under Conservative Governments, incidentally—and again in the 1950s. Harold MacMillan was the Conservative Housing Minister at that time, and he was proud of his house-building record, and particularly of the role he played providing houses for vulnerable people.

House building and housing investment are long-term issues. The hon. Gentleman is right and the Government make a fair point when they say that there is a need to invest in the existing stock. They have chosen to prioritise that above social house building. They probably could have done more of both if they had adopted measures such as those that I have described in respect of the way in which the Housing Corporation uses development money. It is not too late to change that, and an incoming Government with an enlightened Housing Minister could take action quickly to correct those failures.

There are profound concerns about the decent homes standard that formed the background to the Select Committee report. Some of those concerns have been expressed in our debate today, and some are to be found in the Committee's findings. The criticisms are pretty damning. Although they were delivered with the grace and style for which the Chairman of the Select Committee has become so well known, when one strips bare some of the niceties, one finds that the Committee makes it clear that it finds the Government's current policy unsatisfactory in four or five ways. It stated:

"We believe that the Decent Homes standard is set at too basic a level, and that by 2010 it will be seriously out of step with reasonable tenant expectations."

The Government say in their response that that is a baseline. That argument is fair enough, but the real problem with the standard is that it will probably not address the things that most people regard as fundamental. Some of those things have been mentioned. There has been talk of insulation standards, for example. It would not be particularly costly to introduce some of the basic energy conservation standards that would make a real difference in terms of both the cost to the household and the welfare of the people who live there. But that is not part of the standard.

We have heard—I shall return to this issue—that things that happen outside people's front doors are not addressed by the decent homes standard. People are often pretty comfortable about doing things for themselves if they feel they have some control over them. People should have adequate bathrooms and kitchens and all those basic things, and some people feel that they can deal with those things for themselves as long as they get some help and support, but it is different when they walk outside their front door and face graffiti and a vandalised neighbourhood. They may fear going out because of crime or feel that there is no sense of community. Such conditions are perceived by them and by the Committee as largely outside their control. That is why the Committee highlighted both the paucity in the decent homes standard and the need to go beyond it by looking more widely at the other issues that affect people's quality of life.

I shall deal later with how my party might address that issue, but I should like to put on the record the Committee's criticism of the Government and their failure to be as ambitious as they might have been in providing improved standards for people in social housing. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow and the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) also drew attention to that point.

The Committee's second criticism—its Chairman made it clear that this was a central criticism—was:

"We believe that the target of achieving Decent Homes in the social housing sector is being used as a Trojan Horse by the Government in a dogmatic quest to minimise the proportion of housing stock managed by Local Authorities."

That was echoed by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts), who said that there is no evidence that councils are worse landlords than housing associations.

Ms King: I am sure that it is right that there is no evidence that local authorities are worse landlords. The fact is that if the Government have £100,000 to spend on housing and give that money to a local authority, they can build, say, two units at £50,000 each. If they give that money to an RSL, they can build three units. The time that it takes to reduce the numbers of non-decent homes will therefore be increased by one third if the money goes via local authorities instead of RSLs.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Lady is attempting to take us on to the issue of house building; I was really talking about the management of stock, which the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe highlighted. We have already spoken a bit about house building, and the hon. Lady is rightly concerned about it. It is important that we are much more open-minded about how social house building happens. For example, in rural areas, through extending the rural exception site policy, I want to allow private sector developers to cross-subside the provision of social housing through the provision of market housing. That is one example of how we might get more investment in the provision of social housing in areas such as the one that I represent and live in. So there are all kinds of ways in which we can be more open-minded about how we attract additional funds for the provision of housing.

[Mr. Hayes]

With respect, I am grateful for the hon. Lady's comment, but I do not want to be too distracted from the central point made by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe, which is at the heart of the Committee's criticism: is it appropriate for local councils to be landlords? Are they as good at managing housing as other registered social landlords? I have to say that my local authority, Conservative-controlled South Holland district council, is a very good provider of rented housing for the people who need it in my area. As I have gone around and seen other councils, I have found that many of them are good providers and managers of rented housing, too.

I was in High Wycombe recently, and I have also visited that splendid borough of Wandsworth, where I spoke to two very good local campaigners from Battersea and Putney—Dominic Schofield and Justine Greening, both champions of the interests of local people—who tell me that Wandsworth does a good job of managing housing. There is a prejudice that somehow local councils are automatically bad landlords, and it seems to underpin Government policy. The report itself mentions

"a dogmatic quest to minimise the proportion of housing stock managed by Local Authorities. "

I do not understand the logic of that approach. However, that is not to say that we do not have to be open-minded about the subject.

Ms King rose—

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Lady is going to tell me that she does not think that councils are good at managing houses.

Ms King: The point that I was trying to make, but failed to make clearly, is that the Government prefer to put money through RSLs rather than local authorities because, under the current rules—there have been arguments that the rules should be changed—more units are obtained. The criticism that the Committee made was that the Government are pushing things in a certain direction. I urge the Government to push things more quickly in that direction, because otherwise yet another generation of children in Tower Hamlets will grow up in slums.

Mr. Hayes: That brings us neatly to how these things are financed. The interesting view has been expressed that we should look again at how local authorities can borrow money to support the management and improvement of housing stock. The Chairman of the Committee made that point himself. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe, the Committee and hon. Members have said that there should be a level playing field in that regard and that local authorities should be able to invest in housing stock on the basis that they can borrow money against the value of their assets. That is what the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe argued. The Committee argues that that point has some force, and I would be interested to hear in the Minister's response why he feels that it does not.

Mr. Love: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman came in late, but I am ever generous, and am quite happy to let him have another shot.

Mr. Love: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I have been listening carefully to his argument. He seems to be expressing some sympathy with the need to spend more money on social housing, whether to own or rent. Earlier, he seemed to have sympathy for the need for a higher decency standard in housing, which would, of course, cost money. He now seems to be expressing support for a fourth option of councils doing development, which would again cost more money. In adding all that up and taking into account the fact that it is official Opposition policy to reduce the budget in housing, how does he make his sums work?

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman either was not listening or did not understand what I said about social house building, but he did come in late, and I know that this debate was not one of his priorities this afternoon. Notwithstanding that, I shall repeat what I said: if the Housing Corporation approved development programme money were divided 50:50 between low-cost home ownership schemes and houses to rent, 12,500 more homes could be built by the Housing Corporation each year at no extra cost to the Exchequer. Is that clear? There is no extra cost.

In respect of the decent homes standard, I said that I would come on to talk about what the Conservative party was going to do. What I said about the Committee Chairman's suggestion—I hasten to add that it is not my suggestion—that local authorities should operate on a level playing field in terms of their permission to borrow is that it had some merit and that I was interested in the Government's response to it. That is pretty clear, too.

I shall talk in a moment about our view of what we call the decent communities standard and how it might be funded. The hon. Gentleman will perhaps be even clearer when I have finished.

Mr. Kerry Pollard (St. Albans) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that in respect of the 50:50 split, the issue depends on where the houses are being built and how much that costs. For example, there is a great difference in land prices and building costs between St. Helens and St. Albans. The Government did not build as many houses as they needed and as many of us would want, but they are building houses where they are most needed now—in the south-east and the London area—but that means that there are fewer houses per pound than if they were built more generally.

Mr. Hayes: Yes, that is true, which is why I used average or typical prices. The hon. Gentleman is right that there are regional variations. On the land issue, he talked about savings in the housing budget. The vast bulk of the savings in the James review, to which the Minister will no doubt refer in his reply, come from the release of public sector land, which should be released and made available; to judge from the Red Book, that is what the Chancellor thinks, too. The end of the regional development agency land banking could also create a very large extra sum. The savings are detailed in the James report, which I should be happy to make available to the hon. Gentleman and to the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love).

The hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Pollard) is right: of course there are local and regional differences in the cost of building houses. That is one of many reasons why the £60,000 house is such nonsense. It is also nonsense because of the notion that every nurse or teacher wants to live with another nurse or teacher, and that only people in the professions chosen by the Deputy Prime Minister will live in the houses that he defines and designs, and in the places where he wants them to live. What a monstrous suggestion.

Mr. Davey: Incidentally, it is interesting that the James review is predicated on all the land being sold, but the Conservatives are against building more houses and criticise the ODPM for concreting over the countryside. It would be interesting to know how they make those two policies add up.

The hon. Gentleman said that the fourth option had some merit. We are only a few weeks away from the election, and he has obviously been studying housing policy. Will he tell us whether the Conservative party is in favour of the fourth option?

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman raised two specific points. On the first, about extra building, the Government's brownfield development target is 60 per cent., which they have exceeded: the current figure is about 67 per cent. Barratt Homes tells me that 80 per cent. of the houses that it builds are on brownfield land, and in the south and south-east the figure is 90 per cent. The redesignation of brownfield land for residential building from that allocated for employment purposes would free up many residential development opportunities. If he considers the amount of land that is designated for employment purposes against the amount that is identified for residential building, he will see that in all but two regions more is designated for employment, and in every region of the country the take-up is less for employment development.

To make it straightforward, what that means is that many sites remain undeveloped because they are designated for employment development, not residential development. Many local authorities acknowledge that and most developers know it too. The ODPM considered the issue very recently. Many brownfield opportunities in most parts of the country are going to waste. They could be developed for housing. So the idea that the only housing one can build is on green fields is something of a distortion at the very least.

Mr. Pollard: May I give the hon. Gentleman an example from my own constituency? Borras Construction built an office block five years ago and has tried to flog it, rent it and do other things, but it cannot. A planning application was submitted to the local authority, which said that the site was an employment-designated site. It could be guaranteed that there would be 100 per cent. affordable units on the site and still the local authority would stand in the way.

Mr. Hayes: I will not make any comment about the hon. Gentleman's local affairs because that would be discourteous, but I am interested that he has some sympathy with the case that I am making about the need to rethink both the target for brownfield development and how we achieve that target through the more practical designation of appropriate land.

I am being encouraged to go off on a tangent by these pithy and interesting interventions, but I must return to the matter in hand because you will criticise me if I do not, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Committee went on to say:

> "The Government must put its money where its mouth is and leave it up to tenants to decide who should . . . manage their homes. The Government should provide a level playing field in terms of funding so that tenants and Local Authorities have real choices."

It also said:

> "In the private sector, the limitation of the Decent Homes target to just 70 per cent . . . makes little sense."

The Committee's detailed recommendations, which I have studied, make it clear that it has a more open-minded view about who should manage housing than the Government. It feels that there should be much higher levels of tenant involvement—that was echoed by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton, who made an interesting point about the form that that might take—and it suggests that the decent homes standard should be more ambitious in breadth.

How might that be achieved? It could be achieved by establishing a decent communities standard that would consider all the factors that comprise a high quality neighbourhood. Such a standard would necessarily involve a series of Departments and it would certainly involve the private sector, the voluntary sector and a range of local authority departments. It would not all be funded by the Government—far from it. It may be that some of the things that the Government do actually stand in the way of achieving decent communities. We are talking about what the Government do and should not do. The private and the voluntary sector may well be able to take on some of the things that the Government do and relieve some of the cost burden from them accordingly.

The important thing is that the standard would identify the things that the community believes are fundamental to delivering an acceptable quality of life. We have heard repeatedly this afternoon that that is not just about what happens behind people's front doors. Improving housing stock is important, but it is not the only thing that is important. When I look back to the halcyon days on the estate where I was brought up, I can see that it was because of the quality of life, in all kinds of respects, that I had a happy childhood. It was about the availability of appropriate opportunities for people to socialise and to play, and about the little platoons that make up a civilised society—all those small organisations that require support from the

[Mr. Hayes]

Government and should not be over-regulated by them. It is also about the maintenance of good standards of law and order, and about the physical condition of the neighbourhood: how it is maintained in terms of graffiti and vandalism, planting and all the other small but important things.

That is partly about local government, and the Government should act as the catalyst for much of it. However, as I said, it is also about the communities themselves and supporting the voluntary sector strongly in bringing such things about. We should not always assume that this is about spending more money, because that does not always yield the best results.

Mr. Mole: I do not want to diverge too far from the Select Committee report, but I point out that the Government's liveability fund is very welcome in helping to address many of the environmental issues that exist in neighbourhoods. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the James review; will he reassure us that the funds that make communities safer, greener and cleaner would stay in place?

Mr. Hayes: When the James review was being drawn up—and, as I imagine, when the Gershon review was drawn up—those involved in the process were in discussion with those in spending Departments to find a balance. Many of the savings outlined in the James review in respect of the ODPM will be reinvested in our area; that was made absolutely clear in those discussions. Where we choose to reinvest them and how we target them will be a choice that I shall be forced to make in few weeks' time when I move into the Minister's office, but I am not going to reveal in detail how we will go about that. Some of it will depend on the circumstances that apply when we come to power. The hon. Gentleman is right that it would be wrong to assume that all the James money will leave the ODPM; a lot of it will be reinvested to support a range of important and worthwhile projects.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hayes: It is not appropriate for me to debate Conservative party policy here. This is a debate about a Select Committee report, and I will not be encouraged by mischievous interventions by Labour or Liberal Democrat Members, thus receiving criticism from you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for going off the point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question before the House is that the sitting do now adjourn and nothing more.

Mr. Hayes: Ah well. But it would not do any favours to those who spent so long drawing up the report for me to give a long and detailed description of the nature of Conservative policy. I know that the Minister will want at least an hour to respond, so I want to draw my remarks to a conclusion fairly shortly.

Mr. Betts: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: Just briefly, because the hon. Gentleman is so charming.

Mr. Betts: It was a nice ploy of the hon. Gentleman to try to avoid my intervention, because I want to raise precisely the point that I asked him about at the beginning of his speech. He talks of a decent communities standard, but I am unsure about whether that is an extra spending commitment to spend more on the environment around houses or whether he is saying that the Conservatives will spend more on the environment around the houses, but less on the houses themselves. Is he proposing a total spending reduction? He referred to money from the private sector coming from somewhere for something. Would he be a little more precise? Is such money going to replace lots of public funding, and if so, how? I do not really see it myself.

Mr. Hayes: That is a perfectly reasonable question and I shall answer it, I hope, with equal reasonableness. When we published the document that I mentioned earlier, which deals largely with demand-side issues and housing market mechanisms, we said that we would publish a second series of policies. They will be published this month, and they will address some of the issues we have talked about today, such as the availability of brownfield land, how we would enable additional house building where it is needed and the way in which we would enable the decent communities standard to replace the decent homes standard. All those things will be set out in detail; they will be announced and made available for the hon. Gentleman to scrutinise. They will be exciting and attractive, and on their basis I imagine we shall attract many votes in his constituency and elsewhere. He must wait and see; he will get the second tranche of Conservative policies in housing and planning before he has to decide how he votes in the general election.

The Select Committee went on in detail—I will not go through all the details because hon. Members have had a chance to read the report—to identify why it thought that the Government were wrong in the respects that I have highlighted. My view is clear: the Government chose to aim for a decent community standard that would improve the stock to a baseline figure. They now need to think again about whether that baseline figure is sufficient to improve the overall quality of life in a community, and to think again about the management of housing and about whether local authorities should be supported in continuing to manage stock. They also need to think again about enabling tenants to be properly involved in those decisions, and about how tenants can play a greater role in shaping the future of their neighbourhoods, their housing and their communities.

The Government need to think again about how to fill the gap between how many social homes are needed and how many they have managed to build; it is a pitiful number. Unless they think again very quickly, I am afraid that their failure will cost them dear. They now have weeks, not months. I suspect that they do not have time to get this right and that it will require a new Government with a new vision and new and bigger ambitions to fulfil what the Select Committee wants to be fulfilled. More importantly, that is what the British people deserve.

4.31 pm

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): I thank the members of the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and other colleagues for their contributions to the debate.

I pay particular tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Bennett), whose contribution will have been his swansong, at least in this Chamber. I congratulate him on his work as Chairman of the Select Committee, and his long and distinguished parliamentary career. He has played a distinguished part in addressing housing issues, but I hope that he will forgive me when I say that the contribution I shall most remember him for is his wonderful achievement—the right to roam in our countryside. I heartily congratulate him on that.

We have had a wide-ranging debate from, if I may say so, a thrilling cast of characters. Even my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) made a fleeting appearance, and my hon. Friends the Members for Edmonton (Mr. Love) and for St. Albans (Mr. Pollard) also put in a late but welcome appearance. Old chums, one and all. Anyway, enough of this love-in.

The policy pickings from the dishes of the Opposition parties were a trifle meagre. I am genuinely very fond of the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), but why do I always feel that he is making it up as he goes along? As I listened to the hon. Members for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) and for South Holland and The Deepings, I was reminded of the survey of housing professionals carried out by that august journal, Inside Housing, in the new year. I am pleased to say that housing professionals subscribing to it exhibited extremely high levels of support for the Government's sustainable communities policies. When asked about how they intended to vote, 69 per cent. said Labour, 3 per cent. said Conservative, and 2 per cent. said Liberal Democrat. That is a ringing endorsement of our policies from the people who really know about housing.

Many important issues have been discussed in this debate, but I would hate us to lose sight of the big picture and of the Government's commitment to meeting the decent homes target. We have 4.1 million social homes in this country. That is a tremendous asset, which is worth about £400 billion and is an immeasurable asset to the community.

The impact of decades of neglect and underinvestment under the Tories left us in 1997 with a £19 billion backlog of repairs and 2.2 million homes that did not meet the decent homes standard. This Government responded to that challenge by radically changing our approach to housing policy, building in far greater flexibility and capacity for investment than ever before. Let me remind the Chamber of the results of that radical change. Since 1997, we have reduced the number of non-decent social homes by 1 million and we have increased the proportion of vulnerable households in the private sector living in decent homes to 63 per cent. We have increased investment massively. Local authorities have invested more than £13 billion in bringing their homes up to a decent standard, and a further £5.3 billion has been levered in from the private sector through transfer.

On top of that, local authorities' plans indicate that by 2008 they will invest a further £11 billion in their stock. Indeed, between 1997 and 2005–06, the average investment per council home will have increased by 55 per cent. in real terms. We are on track to meet our target of providing a decent home to everyone living in social housing and to 70 per cent. of vulnerable households in private accommodation by 2010. By the time we meet our target, we expect that local authorities and housing associations will have spent about £42 billion on ensuring that their tenants live in decent homes.

Mr. Hayes: I hear what the Minister says, and I am fond of him too. Does he regret the halving of the number of social houses being built? That is what his Government have done.

Keith Hill: If the hon. Gentleman wants to go down that road, why should I not give him a few facts to reflect on? As usual, he drew attention to the levels of social home building in the early 1990s. However, he omitted to point out that in the year that he always selects—1992–93—there were higher levels of affordable housing than now because of mass unemployment and negative equity. At that time, there were historically low levels of new build in market housing. The wonderful year of 1997–98, when we came to power, is the most sensible point of comparison between what his Government and our Government have achieved.

Remember, the Tories halved investment in social housing between 1992 and 1997—that was the base line that we inherited. In 2003–04, we built more new market homes than in 1997, and we shall continue to do that from next year onwards. Yes, we shall not begin to exceed the levels of social homes that we inherited in 1997 until 2007–08, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans rightly said, we have been building more homes in the south-east, where they are most urgently needed, and where, since 2003–04, we have been exceeding the level that we inherited of new social homes built.

Of course, building in the south is an expensive business. Land costs, labour costs and construction costs are at their highest there. That is why, although we will double our investment in social housing over the period to 2008, we will build 50 per cent. more social homes for renting than at present. That record is highly defensible, and I find it difficult to see how that fanciful notion—a Conservative Government—would build more affordable homes than this Government.

The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings has tempted me to do this, and I shall go for it. The James review pledges to cut £1 billion from the sustainable communities fund. That is in black and white on a document that I have drawn down from what I believe is known as the Conservative party website. It says, "Less talk, more action", and it asks people to make a donation. It states in black and white that the "sustainable communities plan" would be scrapped, "saving another £1 billion." The document is absolutely irresistible, and I shall not resist it. It goes on to state:

"Conservatives will reverse the culture of Whitehall targets and central government control. Local decisions should be taken by local councillors and held to account by local people."

[Keith Hill]

That from the party that passed more than 50 Acts of Parliament to destroy the power of local government. However, enough of that; I shall come back to my main theme.

I was saying that our target for decent homes is not merely about bricks and mortar but about individuals and their right to live in a secure and stable environment. Therefore, it is a vital part of the Government's commitment to creating safe, sustainable communities. Last month, as all present will be aware, the Deputy Prime Minister launched "Homes for All", our five-year plan that sets out the way forward for housing. The decent homes target is an integral part of it, and I am confident that we are all agreed that the decent homes strategy is of tremendous importance to our communities and neighbourhoods.

I would like to address some specific, and often contentious, issues. The fourth option was highlighted by my hon. Friends the Members for Denton and Reddish, and for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) and by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton. I want to take this opportunity to assert again the Government's position on the so-called fourth option. The Select Committee was deeply concerned at what was referred to as a "Catch-22" situation. It recommended that there should be a "level playing field", with local authorities that manage their own stock having access to direct investment.

It is the Government's contention that our decent homes programme is the best way forward. It provides three innovative and flexible ways to support local authorities that need additional funding to ensure that their stock meets the decent homes standard. Of course, some local authorities will be able to meet their target on decent homes using mainstream housing funds, their own resources and, perhaps, some prudential borrowing. However, our sustainable communities plan, which was published in February 2003, made it clear that where additional funding was needed, local authorities could not expect increased investment unless they engaged in the options appraisal process.

The fact is that it is not Government policy simply to throw money at a problem. That would be irresponsible and in the long term it would not work. We are under an obligation to ensure that where we provide extra resources, we also drive up performance, allow tenants to have their say about how those extra resources are spent and secure value for money. The truth is that authorities up and down the country are now telling us that the separation of management and strategic function is delivering better services to tenants and that they are now able to take a more strategic view of their wider housing responsibilities.

Mr. Davey: I am afraid that if the Minister tries to caricature the Select Committee's report and people who support the fourth option as throwing money at the problem, he is not engaging in a mature debate. A housing association is able to borrow on the capital markets against future rental income. All the people who support the fourth option are saying, "Give that freedom to local authorities". It is not throwing money, but allowing authorities to borrow prudently, according to guidelines set down by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy and others, to ensure that they have extra cash available to meet local housing needs. I do not think that that can be caricatured in the way that he has just done.

Keith Hill: I will say two things to the hon. Gentleman. I think that I am right in saying that he is a former spokesman on Treasury matters. As such, he will know that these matters are strictly controlled by Treasury rules. We might want to debate those in a separate context, but the blunt truth is that they are the rules under which we operate. The prudential borrowing regime has given local authorities greater flexibility, out of which a number of them have now decided that they can go forward in meeting the decent homes target, while retaining the stock.

I also need to say to the hon. Gentleman—I put this to him very seriously—that it would be quite wrong for the Government simply to accede to a request for additional funding for decent homes from a local authority, without considering the quality of that authority and its capacity to deliver on decent homes. He knows very well that there are many local authorities whose performance in housing delivery, maintenance and services to tenants is not very impressive. Is he really saying that in such circumstances, which might involve a no-star or a one-star authority, the money should simply be made available, without the Government imposing any quality requirements?

Andrew Bennett: Will my right hon. Friend reflect on the remark made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe that there is lots of evidence that some local authority housing departments are extremely well managed, and that in many cases staff have moved over to stock transfer companies or arm's length management organisations? They are exactly the same people. They did not suddenly become good managers because they moved over; what happened was that they got some resources, which enabled them to manage. Where a local authority is prepared to put in place first-class management, please can it borrow some money so it can show that democratically controlled local authorities can do as well as, if not better than, quangos?

Keith Hill: I do not think that we will be able to agree on this subject. Let me say two things. First, as my hon. Friend well knows, we have made a requirement, particularly with regard to ALMOs, that local authorities should achieve at least two stars before funding is allocated to them. That has undoubtedly had the effect of driving up the quality of local housing delivery. Secondly, when I last looked at the statistics for the nine local housing authorities with three stars, seven had already moved over to ALMO or stock transfer. The truth is that the best local authorities are actually getting on with the job of delivering decent homes under the options that we have presented to them. Our policies are succeeding.

Mr. Betts rose—

Mr. Pollard rose—

Keith Hill: May I just move on a little?

Since 1997, tenants from more than 100 authorities have chosen, and benefited from, stock transfer, with further positive ballots awaiting transfer. Fifty-eight ALMOs are up and running or are being set up, with 33 already delivering decent homes. Eight local authorities are pioneering the housing revenue account PFI schemes as pathfinders. We are continuing to see a good response. Earlier this year, we received 66 applications from 38 local authorities for places on the transfer, PFI and ALMO programmes. That does not demonstrate that our options are not working.

Mr. Betts: I would like the Minister to address a point I made. He is clearly ruling out the fourth way—my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish made a good point about that—so let us focus on the choice now facing tenants. If the majority of tenants choose ALMOs and we get more and more requests for them, given that ALMO expenditure is covered by the Government's borrowing requirement, does the Minister guarantee that all those choices to go down the ALMO route will be honoured and the Government will fund them, so that all those tenants' homes will be brought up to a decent standard?

Keith Hill: We are confident that we have sufficient allocated funding in the current spending round to deliver on the expected levels of ALMO applications in that period.

Mr. Pollard: What would the Minister say to council tenants who live in an area of my constituency where a survey was undertaken? Their authority is small but well managed, and its housing stock is in good condition. They voted overwhelmingly in favour of staying with the council, even though the council suggested to them that moving to an ALMO might be a good decision. Therefore, we are not sweating that asset very well. How do we get over that problem? There are many small local authorities with relatively few homes. My authority does not have 120,000 homes, as some of the larger ones do; it used to have 13,000, but it now has only 5,500, following the introduction of the right to buy.

Keith Hill: I have to say to my hon. Friend that we respect the decision of those tenants. They have made the choice to remain with the local authority, presumably in full knowledge of the implications of that for their housing. That is simply a reality. This is not a new announcement; the Government have consistently adopted this position, as have I. What we always say is that it is open to local authorities to revisit those issues. An obvious example of that is the case of Birmingham, where tenants voted against a transfer proposal a couple of years ago. I have been to Birmingham, and have seen the good work that is now taking place; the focus is on 11 housing districts corresponding to constituencies across Birmingham and tenants are being seriously engaged—I suspect that that did not happen in the past. It is always open to local authorities to revisit those issues.

Let us be clear that notwithstanding the preoccupation that hon. Members have with the issue of the fourth way—that is a diminishing issue, as we get closer to the completion of the stock options appraisal process, with the deadline of July 2005—we need to remember that our policies are bringing in hugely increased investment. We are vastly reducing the numbers of households who live in non-decent homes and our policy options are supported by local authorities and by tenants.

Mr. Love: I suspect that I may be the only one on the Minister's side who is sympathetic and supportive to the Government regarding—

Ms King: Hello.

Mr. Love: There are others. I am sympathetic to the Government's position on the various options under option appraisal. I want to put one concern to him—he addressed it earlier, but I want to press him further. We may assume that the transfer programme has encountered some difficulty. The Minister has already indicated that the PFI programme is still at the pathfinder stage and said that the ALMO programme was able to address that in terms of funding. Can he give us an assurance that he will be able to reach the decent homes standard by 2010?

Keith Hill: Yes, I can give that assurance. We are confident that we are on target to meet the decent homes standard across the piece by 2010. I believe that in the course of my remarks I have demonstrated that there is no fourth option, that we do not need a fourth option and that we will not provide one. I fear that, as colleagues, we will have to agree to disagree on that subject for the future.

I shall now take up some of the other issues raised by hon. Members. My hon. Friends the Members for Denton and Reddish and for Sheffield, Attercliffe mentioned decent homes-plus. The Select Committee recommended that we should consider formalising a decent homes-plus standard. I can understand why people would want to do that, but I believe that it would be confusing to consider introducing a new standard at this stage, when we are only part way towards delivering on the current one.

As I have said already, the problem that we faced in 1997 was massive and our target—to undo the damage caused by those years of neglect and under-investment—is challenging enough. To move the goalposts at this stage, when we are on track to meet our target in 2010, would be unfair and unreasonable.

As the Committee recognised, and those in the House will know, the decent homes standard is not, and was never intended to be, an aspirational standard. It is the baseline below which action must be taken, not a standard to which work should be carried out. Naturally, many tenants aspire to higher standards, and we know that, where work is carried out on homes, a higher standard is often attained.

I cite a couple of cities close to my heart—Bradford and Leicester—where I have visited projects in progress. Folk in those cities will proudly say that they are providing decent homes to the Bradford standard and—in the case of my birthplace—to the Leicester standard.

However, tackling all the homes that remain in a state of non-decency, despite the tremendous progress we have made since 1997, is a major challenge within the limits of what is affordable. It would therefore be unjust to take on the refurbishment of more properties, which would be a consequence of raising the baseline, while more than 1 million social tenants still have homes that do not meet the minimum standards of decency. Nevertheless, it is perfectly clear that we shall have to think beyond 2010. After all, stock currently identified as decent is likely to deteriorate, and aspirations are likely to rise. However, we have on our hands a hefty undertaking to meet the existing decent home standard; that task is sufficient for us to focus on now.

[Keith Hill]

Colleagues have raised the issue of the environment, particularly in relation to ALMOs, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) referred to the issue of communal services. Certainly, the issue was brought home to me last week when I was in Sheffield, looking at the progress made in delivering decent homes. Colleagues who spoke on the subject conceded that allowance is now being made for the environment. The argument is that 5 per cent. of the budget is insufficient, but let me give the House an assurance that the Government will continue to think hard about those issues, although my hon. Friends have been correct to suggest that greater investment in the environmental circumstances of social housing is available under transfer and PFI.

Let me also say a word about decent homes in the private sector—another issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe. We take non-decency in the private sector very seriously. It is only right to focus on vulnerable households. The target of providing a decent home to 70 per cent. of them by 2010 reflects the complexities of the target and the level of resources available to deal with it. We are trying to maximise the resources available by encouraging local authorities to develop new means of providing financial assistance, such as loans and equity release.

The target that we have set for private sector decent homes is challenging but achievable, given the more complex picture of responsibilities in the private sector and the scale of the problem. We shall, of course, keep the target under review in the light of progress made towards meeting it. However, I must tell the House that we are well on course to achieving our target to make decent 70 per cent. of the homes of vulnerable households in the private sector by 2010, and to reach 75 per cent. by 2020. The 2001 baseline was 57 per cent. and the 2006 milestone was 65 per cent. The 2003 English house condition survey shows that the target percentage has increased to 63 per cent.

Progress is being made through local partnerships to develop new ways of tackling the housing problems that they face. We have allocated £60 million to kick-start funding to support the development of new loans schemes, such as those run by HouseProud in London, Art Homes in the west midlands, and the Wessex Reinvestment Trust in the south-west.

Let me now turn to the issue of overcrowding, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow. I pay tribute to her diligence in these matters, not least because she went to the trouble of submitting evidence to the Select Committee on the decent homes inquiry. That is characteristic of her long-term, extraordinarily high and passionate commitment to housing issues. On overcrowding, we expect to consult on our thinking on the proposals shortly and on the amendments that I was pleased that we were able to make to the Housing Bill, very much at her instigation.

I draw my hon. Friend's attention and that of the Chamber to new draft PPG3 on housing, which requires local authorities to shift the focus of the new provision of housing from simple numbers of dwellings to the required mix of households. That new emphasis will allow local authorities to work with house builders and developers to deliver larger houses. My hon. Friend has spoken eloquently on many occasions about the need for them.

Ms King: Yesterday I visited a family of eight people living in two bedrooms. They take much heart from hearing that the Government really are putting into action the promises that measures will be taken to reduce overcrowding, which has crippled so many lives.

Keith Hill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those words as well. As a London Member, I recognise the deep-seated problems that she faces in her constituency and I fully acknowledge that the pressures are much greater in Tower Hamlets than in any other part of London.

Mr. Hayes: As the hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow said, overcrowding is exacerbated by the lack of available housing. We discussed the failure to build social housing. In fact, contrary to what the Minister said, this Government's record is the worst since 1947. There is no year since 1997 in which they built more, or even as many, social houses than were built in any of the previous years.

The hon. Lady also made a point about low-cost home ownership. Will the Minister reverse the Government's policy of running down schemes that facilitate low-cost home ownership? A graph for the take-up of low-cost home ownership shows that it has fallen every year under this Government's stewardship.

Keith Hill: Let me make several points in response to the hon. Gentleman's intervention and on the issue of low-cost home ownership, which was also raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow. I remind the House that by 2008 we will have delivered 75,000 new homes for social renting. That is an increase of 50 per cent. on current figures, and it reflects a doubling of investment in housing in comparison with 1997. The truth is that, since 2001–02, we have been building homes for low-cost home ownership and intermediate renting at a higher level than we inherited. That is the simple reality of the situation.

In response to my hon. Friend, I can say that via the key worker living scheme, social homebuy, the first-time buyer scheme and other low-cost home ownership initiatives, we expect to have brought 80,000 people into low-cost home ownership by 2010. However, it is always a matter of resources. We do our best.

There is no doubt that housing has risen to the top of the political agenda. We dispose of a massive £38 billion budget for sustainable communities, which I believe will be maintained in the future. I hope that it will be possible in the long term to meet the aspirations for home ownership of those who are on lower incomes, and to meet the aspirations for social renting of as many as possible of our fellow citizens at various income levels. However, we must recognise that all those aspects of housing delivery demand resources. The House will be familiar with the Government's commitment in "Homes for All" to halve current levels of temporary accommodation by 2010.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton spoke about a menu of choices, which seems to be the main new element of the Liberal Democrats' policy on decent homes. It is an interesting proposition. Indeed, I would argue that it is largely implemented already.

We must be clear that any decisions made by local communities should be applied across the board. This is perhaps the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish was getting at when he said that we had to think about future occupants. As a constituency MP, I am sick and tired of constituents coming to me and saying, "Every other flat in the block has central heating. Why doesn't mine?" Under some crazy decision-making process years ago people were allowed to choose whether to have central heating. We all know that it is now phenomenally expensive to introduce central heating into single blocks. Whichever direction we take, the solutions will have to apply across the board.

I make no apology for the emphasis that the Government have placed on the provision of modernised kitchens, bathrooms and central heating where necessary in terms of the decent homes programme. People can be sniffy about the standard that decent homes offers, but if one visits the homes of tenants that have been modernised under the programme one finds a phenomenal gratitude for and delight at the improvements to their homes. I have observed and expressed more joy about more modernised bathrooms and kitchens than I have had hot dinners over the last two years since I became the Minister responsible for housing.

To revert to the point made by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton, I would argue that such choice is intrinsic to the stock option appraisal process. It is out of the process of discussion about the aspiration of tenants that decisions about retention, ALMOs, stock transfer and PFI are reached. If it is suggested that the options appraisal process, as it operates at present, does not allow tenants sufficient say in how their homes should be maintained and managed, I would point out that tenants are absolutely at the heart of the options appraisal process. The need to engage with them and to seek their views on the future management of their homes is vital to our policies.

All local authorities are obliged to draw up communications strategies that set out in practical terms exactly how they intend to involve tenants and other stakeholders. However, we go further than that: we also ensure that tenants are properly equipped to make informed decisions about the options open to them. We recognise that it is fundamental to tenants' rights that they can access impartial information, without bias towards one option or another. This is why we encourage local authorities to use an independent tenant adviser to ensure that tenants have a clear picture of the process.

Tenant engagement does not stop once a decision has been made. Tenants make up around one third of the governing bodies of transfer housing associations and ALMOs, broadening tenant participation to estate and neighbourhood level. The involvement of tenants at board level inevitably leads to a closer engagement in the management of their homes, but we expect ALMOs to continue increasing opportunities for tenants to get involved as part of the overall service they provide.

I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe that tenant satisfaction is increasing. For example, a tenant satisfaction survey in 2000 found that 85 per cent. of transfer tenants were either very or fairly satisfied with their landlord. Fewer than one in 10 tenants surveyed felt that the service previously provided by their local authority was superior. As I draw my remarks to a conclusion, let me say that the Select Committee report provided a degree of challenge to our policies for delivering decent homes.

Mr. Pollard: The Minister has not talked about the infrastructure implications of the new build. The East of England regional assembly has suddenly announced that it does not support the extra house building because the infrastructure cost implications of the new build would not be met. Every secondary and primary school in my constituency is full. Our population is increasing. We want to build more houses but the infrastructure is not there. We need to balance the two.

Keith Hill: My hon. Friend is right. I have not mentioned infrastructure because it is not the subject of our debate, but he makes a fair point about the need for infrastructure in the growth areas. We recognise that new housing growth must go hand in hand with the provision of new hard and soft infrastructure. The hard infrastructure will be by way of transport provision, and I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that, as a result of the multi-modal studies, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport last year announced a colossal £3.1 billion of new investment in transport infrastructure in the growth areas in the south of England.

In addition, my hon. Friend will be aware that my Department, jointly with the Department for Transport, administers a committee infrastructure fund worth £200 million. That is also devoted to providing key transport infrastructure in the growth areas. As we experience housing growth, health and education provision must not follow, but must be introduced simultaneously. The fact is that last year the Department of Health doubled investment in primary care trusts in the housing growth areas to £40 million, precisely to meet the growth anticipated. The Department for Education and Skills is working closely with my Department to develop a programme of education and skills provision that will respond to housing growth in London and the wider south-east. That was a bit of a digression, but I hope that it was helpful to my hon. Friend.

I was saying that the Select Committee's report provided a degree of challenge to our policy for delivering decent homes. We remain confident that the measures that we set in place provide local authorities with the innovative and flexible support that they need to bring all their homes up to a decent standard. It is important to consider the real human impact of this strategy. What ought to take priority in our minds are the enormous benefits that our policies are having on individuals, families and communities. As I said, I have had the opportunity to see the results of these policies on the ground, and the results for the tenants, in the homes that they want, need and deserve.

[Keith Hill]

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twelve minutes past Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 8 March 2005

[MR. JOHN MCWILLIAM in the Chair]

M11 Growth Area

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Yvette Cooper.]

9.30 am

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): I am delighted to have secured this debate on the impact of the Government's policies on the M11 growth area and on my constituency in particular. For those who do not have the pleasure of knowing where my constituency is, Hertford and Stortford is in East Hertfordshire, which is the only rural district left in the county. As I shall explain, the Government's planning and development policies represent the greatest challenge in a generation to my constituents' environment and quality of life.

Indeed, the east of England plan, which puts those policies into practice, is currently out to consultation. For my constituency, it would mean 20,800 new houses or a 36 per cent. rise in population. We would have 47,000 extra people, using up to 28,000 more cars. The plan would mean 2,500 more peak-time commuters on a railway service that is already overstretched, as most hon. Members who use the line will know. It would also create the need for 3,700 extra school places, which would mean 300 more pupils for every secondary school in my constituency. Just as importantly, perhaps, the plan would mean the destruction of thousands of acres of green fields and the wildlife that lives in them. For those and other reasons, the plan is opposed by the overwhelming majority of my constituents. We believe that it is unnecessary and unsustainable, and that the process driving it is, frankly, undemocratic.

No one is suggesting that there should be no development; of course, there is a need to provide more housing for those on lower incomes. Yet the scale of the developments proposed is far in excess of the need in our area. Indeed, my constituents are not the only people withholding their support from the plan. Somewhat bizarrely, the sponsoring body itself, the East of England regional assembly, has withdrawn its support for the plan. Thus, we have the nonsense of a plan being promoted by a body that does not support it to a community that does not want it.

Underlying the regional plan are the Government's policies on the green belt and on what they like to call sustainable communities, and I want to examine those policies further. About two years ago, in, I think, February 2003, the Deputy Prime Minister proudly announced the launch of his sustainable communities plan. It was an ambitious statement, but it had some rather fundamental flaws. First—this may seem somewhat strange to hon. Members—there was no definition of what a sustainable community actually is. Secondly, the policy failed to incorporate the understood and accepted principles of sustainable development. Indeed, as the Environmental Audit Committee put it in its recent report,

"environmental considerations remain a bolt-on rather than a primary concern."

Two years on, in January 2005, after much labouring on the issue and, no doubt, thousands of consultants' studies and investigations, the Deputy Prime Minister finally came up with a definition:

"Sustainable communities are places where people want to live and work, now and in the future."

Wow! What a lot of money was well spent. I can see that we got good value for money and incisive thinking, but what does it mean in practice? What are the key determinants that make up a community that is deemed to be sustainable? How do we balance growth against protecting our environment? What does all this mean for my constituents and the constituents of my right hon. and hon. Friends in the plan's growth areas? For a sustainable communities plan to be worthy of its name, surely it should be founded on the environmental principles of sustainable development. Yet these policies lack that foundation. As the Government's own Environment Agency put it, the housing plans for the south-east and my area are "an environmental time bomb". Those are its words, not mine.

I shall talk briefly about green-belt planning. Ever since it was introduced by Duncan Sandys back in the 1950s, green-belt policy has been accepted across the House as a great success. It has contained communities and helped them to renew, and it has allowed us to prevent urban sprawl. In 2003, however, the Government changed the rules as part of their new plan. That went largely unnoticed by the experts, let alone the public. The Deputy Prime Minister announced that the Government would "maintain or increase green-belt land"

—and this is key—

"in every region in England."—[Official Report, 5 February 2003; Vol. 399, c. 275.]

In other words, the policy has changed from protecting specific sites and is now based on the total acreage, but as hon. Members will know, the essence of a green belt is that it is the permanent prohibition of development in a specific location. For example, the metropolitan green belt in my constituency should be permanent to prevent London and towns and other areas in my constituency from becoming one large urban mass. Yet the Government's policy is that they could release such land if they were to re-badge land somewhere else in the region as green belt. I assume—perhaps the Minister will clarify this point—that if the Government were to de-designate a couple of hundred acres in east Hertfordshire from the metropolitan green belt, they could redesignate land around Peterborough and claim that they had fulfilled the policy. However, people would regard that as nonsense.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Surely there is another danger in that agricultural land that will be protected as such and would not be developed can be called green belt? Green belt can thereby be eaten up by re-branding agricultural land.

Mr. Prisk: My hon. Friend highlights another problem with this policy change, whose implications are enormous. In principle, any land in any of the constituencies represented in the Chamber today that is currently designated green belt could be developed. That is why I argue that there is no longer a green belt, but an elastic band that is designed to stretch as far as possible to accommodate any change or proposal. That is a huge mistake.

Loosening the constraints on urban development undermines the redevelopment of existing towns. After all, why would property developers waste their time and money on a complex, time-consuming and less profitable urban renewal project when more profitable green-belt sites only a mile or so away might come on to the market? My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) and I have already seen speculators from abroad pegging out greenfield sites to encourage people in this process. I hope that the Minister will explain why the Government have made the change and how she can justify it to my constituents.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): My hon. Friend is advancing a powerful argument about the elastic belt of the Deputy Prime Minister. He is not the only one who holds the view that he has expressed. The Library has made it absolutely clear—I refer directly to what it has said—that the land that has been added to the green belt since 1997 is in areas where development pressure is not the greatest. That is exactly as my hon. Friend says, and it comes from an empirical source rather than a partisan one.

Mr. Prisk: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point, which highlights the fact that such a view is held not only by a small group, but by the professionals involved and the experts who study these issues.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Is the hon. Gentleman concerned that there is a 17.5 per cent. tax incentive to build on greenfield sites rather than to repair, convert and use existing buildings?

Mr. Prisk: I am aware that the Liberal Democrats are hoping to increase the tax on new homes by equalising the VAT levels.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Oh.

Mr. Prisk: I did not know that my hon. Friend was not aware of that, but that is the Liberal Democrats' proposal. There is a danger in such an approach, because many young first-time buyers who are hoping to buy new homes will face those costs, but I understand the underlying issue that the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) raises.

Given those flaws in the Government's policies, some of us had thought that they at least understood that none of their ambitions could be fulfilled without the necessary infrastructure. Indeed, Lord Rooker is on record as saying this in evidence to the Environmental Audit Committee:

> "We are not going to have growth without the infrastructure."

On the back of that assertion, he encouraged many members of the East of England regional assembly to back the regional plan by saying that the Government would of course fund essential infrastructure, and so the assembly backed the plan. Yet when the initial bid for funds, particularly for transport, was submitted, 75 per cent. of the value of the bid was refused. That is why EERA members have withdrawn their support. Will the Minister tell us why Lord Rooker made a promise that he could not keep? Why should we believe that bids for future years will fare any better?

There is one speculative development scheme that highlights all the worst aspects of these policies and how damaging they could be to our environment if they are not amended. The scheme in question is promoted by an oil company's pension fund, and it is a plan for a new settlement of at least 10,000 houses to be built on 3,000 acres of green belt. While the owner, BP, calls the development "Harlow North", hon. Members may be surprised to learn that it is not actually in Harlow. It is not even in Essex. Rather peculiarly, it will be built in Hertfordshire. First, the scheme relies on the release of at least 1,500 acres of green-belt land, and 3,000 acres of land in total. "BP New Town", as I have christened it—sadly, I suspect that that is what it will be known as—would swamp the villages of Eastwick and Gilston, High Wych and Hunsdon, and link Harlow with Sawbridgeworth, Ware and Hertford, making one long urban sprawl. That would result in the loss of some of the most beautiful landscape in Hertfordshire, and according to the expert report of the 1974 plan that last looked at Harlow's future, the damage to the character of Harlow would be "irreparable".

Harlow, as a 42-year-old new town, certainly needs renewing. I accept that, as do many local people. However, by creating a new settlement next door to Harlow, this scheme, which draws on some of the worst aspects of the Government's policies, would divert much-needed resources from the town's regeneration. It would be bad not just for the countryside, but for the town. As if that were not enough, BP's new town would be sited on a hill directly below Stansted's flight path. The roofs of some 10,000 homes—and, I assume, of 20,000 to 25,000 people—would be just 600 m beneath the wheels of incoming aircraft. Who on earth would want to live there?

The reality of the Government's policies on development along the M11 is that our communities would not be sustained; they would be swamped. In lacking the principles of sustainable development and in allowing urban sprawl across green-belt land, the Government's policies will be bad both for the environment and for the much-needed renewal of our existing communities. We need new homes, but we also need to ensure that our ambitions for growth do not ignore our environment and our quality of life. As they stand today, these Government policies are wrong in principle, and I believe that they will prove to be unworkable in practice.

9.44 am

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) on securing this important debate on an issue that has so many ramifications and that could have such a harsh impact on so many communities in Essex, Suffolk, Hertfordshire and Cambridgeshire.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman develops his argument—this point does not relate to what he is saying—I wish to say that this is a local debate, and that in the circumstances, having seen the hon. Members who wish to speak, I am content not to use Mr. Speaker's ruling in respect of limiting the winding-up speeches.

Mr. Burns: Thank you Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I rise both in sorrow and in anger about what the Government are seeking to do by imposing a top-down solution to house building that, frankly, is environmental vandalism on a scale that has not been seen since the introduction of the original planning laws in this country. The devastation that it will cause to environments throughout the region is incalculable, and it will never be possible to turn back the clock. Once greenfield and green-belt land has been built on and concreted over, there is no way for it to be successfully restored to its original condition.

The Chelmsford local authority area adjoins the M11 corridor and is part of the growth area for those horrendous plans. The impact will be particularly difficult in that area. We have been told that we have to produce 14,000 homes as part of the Government's schemes. That is unsustainable, unwarranted and grossly unfair. To add insult to injury, the Chelmsford local authority area has been used in some ways as a dumping ground for housing to fulfil the Government's diktat. As everyone accepts, 2,500 of the 14,000 houses being imposed have nothing to do with the local housing needs of the Chelmsford local authority area, or even of the mid-Essex area. They are being imposed on Chelmsford simply and solely to relieve the pressure on housing in the south of Essex. To my mind, that must be as wrong as the decision to put such a large scale of housing into one local authority area.

The sad fact is that nobody has given any thought to the implications that that will have with regard to the existing infrastructure. Seeking to relieve pressure in such a way in the south of a county logically suggests that the vast majority of the people who will live in the homes in question will probably work in the south of the county—particularly, in this case, in the Thames gateway, which is being developed at the moment. Such people will have to travel to work mostly by car, not by train, and that will cause even more congestion and problems for our transportation system in Essex.

On top of that, we do not have the sustainable infrastructure to carry the 14,000 houses. The policy of the last Conservative Government and this Government has been that there must be maximum use of brownfield sites. I suspect that no one disagrees with that common-sense policy. It is important that brownfield sites should be redeveloped rather than greenfield sites, or before they are moved on to.

Chelmsford local authority has spent a considerable amount of time successfully identifying brownfield sites in the borough and developing them to help meet the targets that have been thrust upon it. It has been imaginative and, as I have said, successful. However, I have to tell the Minister that there is a limit to the local authority's brownfield land, and that limit is well short of being able to accommodate the target of 14,000 houses that the authority has to fulfil. That means that greenfield sites in the borough will have to absorb the extra housing, and that will be a loss to the borough as more and more of them are concreted over.

We have an interesting situation in Chelmsford; where would the houses go? To date, no definitive decisions have been made, because two years ago, the incoming local authority threw out the structure plan proposed by the previous Liberal Democrat administration. That was an interesting episode in terms of how Liberal Democrats operate. There is a village called Boreham in the north-east of my constituency; it is a small, compact village community that identifies itself with its local population. It used to be a Liberal Democrat council seat, and when the Liberal Democrat councillor retired three years ago, forcing a by-election, the Liberal Democrats descended on the village, giving categorical assurances that none of the extra housing would be imposed on it. The electorate were wiser than the Liberal Democrats gave them credit for: they replaced the retiring councillor not with another Liberal Democrat, but with a Conservative, on a 30 per cent. swing.

Within six months, the Liberal Democrat council had drawn up its plans to place 2,200 houses in the village, despite the promises not to do so that it had given only five months before. Fortunately, the Liberal Democrat administration was thrown out by the general electorate of Chelmsford in the last local elections. The proposal, which was a breach of the voters' trust, was abandoned. Chelmsford went back to the drawing board and it is successfully going through the procedures. That does not detract, however, from the difficult decisions that will have to be taken as a result of the Government's diktat on how many houses we should have.

As to the knock-on effect, swathes of greenfield sites would be concreted over. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford rightly said, infrastructure would be needed to sustain those communities and help them develop. That includes the health service, education, the transportation system and water. There is a water shortage, and winters such as the one that we have just had are placing increased pressures on the eastern region and the south-east of the country, because of lack of rainfall. There are not enough natural resources to sustain such house building.

There will also be pressures on our budgets. Given the amount of house building going on already, it is extraordinary that the Chelmsford local authority area does not get extra help from the Department of Health in the way that other communities closer to the M11 do. When lobbied, the Department of Health has steadfastly refused to accept that the growth areas attached to the M11 corridor should get more funding to take into account the ever-increasing population. Because of house building on brownfield sites, there is already an ever-increasing population. In the past five years, the electorate in my constituency has grown from 75,000 to 81,000 people. That is 6,000 extra bodies, excluding children under 18, who are living in the area, and using and requiring the local services. But the Government are turning a blind eye to those increased pressures and demands, and they are refusing to help in the transition as the population increases. That must be wrong.

[Mr. Burns]

In the final analysis, it is totally wrong that a Government in Whitehall who, not unnaturally, are not familiar with every area of a town should impose their will on local people and local elected representatives, and say that an area has to take its proportion of the extra housing demanded in the area by central Government.

Mr. Prisk: My hon. Friend is representing his constituents powerfully and effectively, as always. Will his constituents be as concerned as mine that, unbeknown to them, the planning policies have changed? Instead of planning guidance being just that—non-statutory guidance—constituents will find that their local authority may have to put such housing proposals in place in future, even if they have elected a council whose clear policy is the reverse?

Mr. Burns: My hon. Friend makes an extremely powerful and worrying point, and he is absolutely right. There is grave concern that the Government, through their constant interference, are placing more power at the centre in Whitehall, which can overrule representatives who were elected because they wanted to take one type of planning decision, but find that their hands are tied and that they are unable to take such action because of the decisions of central Government.

The other matter that causes grave concern and upset in my constituency is the role of the East of England regional assembly. It is unelected and it has made decisions that disregarded the interests of Essex, Hertfordshire and parts of Suffolk and south Cambridgeshire.

Mr. Prisk: I am almost hesitant to interrupt my hon. Friend's flow, but several constituents have expressed to me the worry that the crossover with the Government's policies on the standards board may mean that when councillors are campaigning on whether the assembly is wrong, they may preclude themselves from engaging in a debate in council in due course. There may be a bizarre scenario in which elected members of local authorities are precluded from participating in such activity.

Mr. Burns: Absolutely. As my hon. Friend will undoubtedly agree, such a development would be complete nonsense and a travesty of local democracy. We must face up to such matters, however, because we have a Government who are determined to interfere and lay down the law. My hon. Friends and I believe in local democracy and think that decisions should be taken locally; there should be bottom-up decisions, not superimposed top-down decisions. Local elected councillors and local communities have the best understanding of their area and its present and future requirements. They are far better qualified to make the decisions that best meet the needs and the future requirements of local communities than central Government, who probably have little knowledge of the local area and certainly have little interest in it.

I believe passionately that what the Government are doing is wrong. It is dangerous because it will destroy so much of our environment. It will have the knock-on effect of impacting adversely on local communities as more urban sprawl leads to soulless communities that will have no true identity with their area. It is wrong that the Government should superimpose those decisions, which are irreversible, on communities that do not want them. In no way are they prepared to listen to a just argument or to think again, however passionate, reasonable and right the pleas are for them to do so.

9.58 am

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): This disastrous development is a catastrophe for the Hertfordshire countryside. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) on securing such an important debate. All our local newspapers are running campaigns against the proposals. I suppose that the most common way in which to describe matters is that local residents are saying no to Prescottshire.

My constituency is the second largest in the home counties. The neighbouring constituency is that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Sir Alan Haselhurst). He is also extremely worried about the proposals and has attended meetings with my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford, the East of England regional assembly and others. We want to conserve the precious countryside in our constituencies.

Hertfordshire is already the most populated county. The villages and the small market towns that are threatened by the proposals are genuinely rural. They are the lungs of the county. Once we start fiddling about with the green belt to enable large developments to take place, we damage a precious and much-loved resource for local people throughout Hertfordshire. Let us consider the area of Cole Green and its five greens in the south of my constituency. Those areas have already had to put up with a great deal of gravel extraction over the years. To add on top of that the threat of extra housing development seems extremely unfair.

In Thundridge, we have recently secured the bypass, which makes that area much quieter for residents. The village is no longer divided by the busy A10. However, does it really have to tolerate extensive extra housing development? Standon and Puckeridge are other historic centres on the junction of the A10 and the A120. Are they expected to take hundreds of extra houses?

The Pelhams are also affected. The House should have great respect for Furneux Pulham because when Lord Monteagle lived there, he gave the alarm about the gunpowder plot. We could all have been blown up—well, not us but our predecessors—if it had not been for Lord Monteagle of Furneux Pelham.

Little Hadham is another small, but beautiful village. Then come Buntingford and Royston, both ancient market towns. Royston has a history of the Templars and the Royston cave is the only historic monument of its type in Hertfordshire. Down the A505 towards Letchworth, one goes through the historic market town of Baldock and on to Letchworth Garden City, the world's first garden city. Planners come to Letchworth from across the world to see how a garden city can be developed and matured properly. Along the way are the villages of Therfield, Sandon, Ashwell and Weston, which are all beautiful places with lovely countryside around them.

The Environmental Audit Committee considered the Government's so-called sustainable communities plan and found that it had not been thought through at all. No evidence had been taken about the environmental impact. The Committee wrote an incredibly critical, savage report attacking the Government's ignorant approach. I want to ask the Minister whether any serious thought has been given to the plans as they relate to one to another. The growth area that we are talking about—the M11 corridor—is next to, or quite close to, the growth area for Milton Keynes.

It is worth recording that the north of the M11 corridor has some large cities and towns, such as Peterborough and Cambridge, which are surrounded by sparsely populated areas. However, the south of the corridor, in Hertfordshire, is quite the opposite. It is made up of small market towns and villages, quite close to one another, and they are not large places. They have populations of 20,000 or 30,000.

The Government seem to think that we have got it wrong in Hertfordshire and that we ought to have large towns with sparsely populated areas around them that could be developed. That is exactly what they propose for Harlow and Stevenage—that Stevenage should have 14,400 extra houses tacked on the side. Interestingly referring to what my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford said, they will not be under the flight path for Stansted this time, but the flight path for Luton. Why should we change Hertfordshire from what it has always been—a tracery of lanes with small market towns and villages—into something like Cambridgeshire?

Mr. Prisk: As always, my hon. Friend highlights both the beauty of his constituency and why that should be preserved. There is another difference between us and Cambridgeshire; we are abutting London. The metropolitan green belt is the essence of why the pattern of communities that we have now is right. Does my hon. Friend share my view that if we were to follow the diktat of the reports presented by the Government, the danger is that we will get not a Cambridge with a sparse population around the edge, but one large urban mass from the Thames all the way up to Stansted airport?

Mr. Heald: That is exactly the point, and my hon. Friend puts it very well. If we develop the most densely populated county as though it were not, we will end up with something unbearable. As with the Harlow scheme, the scheme for Stevenage is to build the houses in the North Herts district rather than the Stevenage district. We will therefore end up with half of Stevenage in north Hertfordshire.

At the same time as the plan to develop Stevenage is the plan in the Milton Keynes growth area to develop Luton, which is the second largest conurbation in the eastern region. It needs development—no one could argue with that—but what will happen if we develop both Stevenage and Luton, given that they are only about five or six miles apart? We will end up either with the two merging or with competition that is damaging to one or the other.

Did anybody think about what will happen on the border between the growth areas? It is silly to try to develop Stevenage and Luton in that way, side by side. As my hon. Friend said, there is a danger that we will end up with a conurbation that I would call "Hevenage"—Hitchin and Stevenage—but it could also be "Bevenage" if Baldock is included, or "Levenage" if Luton is included. There could be a massive conurbation in north Hertfordshire, which would impinge on the areas that are the lungs of the county. The villages that I have mentioned, which are also supposed to take extra housing, would be threatened. We would end up with a massive conurbation and every village and small community would have large numbers of houses tacked on to it. The area, which people value, would be spoiled not only for the people who live in the villages, but for those who go to the rural areas to walk and enjoy the countryside.

Mr. Prisk: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is illogicality at the heart of the Government's proposal? People want to go to districts such as East Hertfordshire and North Hertfordshire because of the quality of the environment, so is it not ironic that the plan that seeks to respond to that demand will destroy the very reason that people go there?

Mr. Heald: Yes, of course. I have always thought it unfair on other parts of the United Kingdom to put all the effort, resource and money into the south-east and east of England. Surely, we ought not to knock down 400,000 houses in the north and put 400,000 houses in the south. That is nonsense. The Government need to get a grip of their regional policy and to allow the market to work; there is obviously a market in housing.

My hon. Friend raised the issue of resources. In the south of my constituency between Hertford and Stevenage, and in my hon. Friend's constituency, is the River Beane, which is very dry. It does not have the water it once did, and local residents are extremely worried about that, as is the River Beane Preservation Society. That problem reflects the fact that our area is the driest part of England. I cannot see where the water for the developments will come from. The Minister may say that it can be found and, of course, the water authorities have a statutory duty to achieve that result, but how will they get water down from the north of England to the south for these developments? There certainly is not enough water that can be brought up through boreholes; as I said, the River Beane is already short of water.

There is also a problem with roads. We are talking about the M11, but nearby is the A1(M). If the Minister were to go on the A1(M) one morning, she would see that it is already snarled up. It is extremely congested between our area around Baldock down to Stevenage and beyond, and coming into London. What is the plan to widen that road? I am not aware of any such plan, but there should be one. If the proposals are going to go ahead, money should be spent on the A1(M). Will the Minister tell us when the A1(M) will be widened, because we would love to know?

What about the trains? If there is to be this extremely large population increase, a lot of the extra people will want to travel to London to work. The Welwyn viaduct is narrow; it has two lanes for trains. If the number of trains going into London is to be increased, either that viaduct must be widened or longer station platforms must be provided so that the trains can be longer—and, in any event, extra power on the line will be needed. Will the Minister tell us when we will get those things, because we would like to know? If the Government are seriously considering building a second Welwyn viaduct, that would be very big news for the Hertfordshire Mercury.

[Mr. Heald]

Mr. Edward Davey: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Strategic Rail Authority recently published a report—I believe that the regional planning panel received it—that said that there was little or no prospect of any major rail investment in the M11 corridor? Therefore, he makes a powerful point.

Mr. Heald: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman; it is marvellous that he is such an expert on this subject, and what he says is right. I had a meeting last Friday with representatives of the rail company to talk about those problems, and about improving Letchworth station. They said that we might have a better idea about whether we will get longer platforms by 2012. That is almost eight years away, which is quite a long time. I mentioned the Welwyn viaduct, and the representative from Network Rail almost fell off his chair at the thought of the hundreds of millions of pounds that would need to be spent to build a second one.

Mr. Prisk: It is the wrong kind of money.

Mr. Heald: It is certainly a lot of money. Will the Minister tell us what is to happen with regard to our trains?

We are 300 doctors short for the next three years, so we need to recruit 300 doctors in Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire over that time. How many doctors does the Minister think we will need to cope with the M11 corridor growth, and where will they come from? The current plans of the work force study are based on the hope that some asylum seekers will be doctors and that they might fill the gap. Is the Minister relying on people who might accidentally come to this country as a way of us getting the more than 300 extra doctors that we will need?

At present, if people in Royston want to join a dentist's list they have to travel 25 miles to Bishop's Stortford, so it is clear that there are not enough dentists either. In every area of Hertfordshire, every kind of service or facility that someone might need is already stretched. We pay a lot more tax than other parts of the country, but we get a lot less for our it. Can the Minister tell us what will happen about services?

In Tewin in my constituency, speculators have erected fences all over a lovely hill in the Mimram valley. That looks terrible; the hill has been divided up into little plots even though it is in the green belt and, in theory, cannot be developed. Such things are being done on the back of the Deputy Prime Minister having said that the green belt is elastic; people buy up any bit of agricultural land, put up fences all over it, and then pretend that it may have development potential in the future. That is what is happening in Tewin and Braughing. What will the Minister do about that?

This whole scheme is ill-thought through, as the Environmental Audit Committee said. None of the questions about infrastructure have been answered. The green belt seems to count for nothing. I join the local papers in saying no to Prescottshire.

10.14 am

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) on securing this important debate, which gives us a chance to air our views on this Government development proposal. I would like to start off by taking an overview, because the Government have four growth areas around London and the south-east. The Thames gateway is the largest such area, but there is also Ashford, Milton Keynes and the M11 corridor, and of those four growth areas, the M11 corridor is the least proven and the most controversial.

I am certainly in favour in general of the things that are proposed in the Thames gateway and around Ashford and Milton Keynes. There are problems with transport infrastructure in all three of those growth areas. There are one or two problems with flooding in the Thames gateway, with the Association of British Insurers saying that perhaps 10,000 homes would be in danger of flooding if the plans were to go ahead. There are individual problems in those three growth areas, but, on the whole, they seem to make some sort of sense, and the local councils have, in general, been prepared to accept some of the thrust of the Government's policy.

However, the M11 corridor has generated a degree of controversy that we have not seen for a long time. The three Conservative Members' speeches explained why that concern is so deeply felt. While I am giving the overview of the sustainable communities plan, I want to take up the point that the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) made about other parts of the country.

There is no doubt that there are other parts of the country that would welcome more homes, less demolition and more economic regeneration. My colleagues on Liverpool city council have been doing a tremendous job in the past six years of turning that city around and attracting more than £2 billion of private sector investment in the city centre alone. With the award of the status of European capital of culture, Liverpool is experiencing a big regeneration. Yet Mr. Prescott is asking parts of Liverpool to have more homes demolished.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should refer to other Members by their constituencies or the title of their office, not by name.

Mr. Davey: I was tempted by the new name of the county, which I had not heard before, so you were right to pull me up on that, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

There is no doubt that, although some demolition in the city of Liverpool was accepted by the community, the Deputy Prime Minister has pushed ahead with a much higher number of demolitions, which goes against the wishes of the community. It seems absurd, as the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire has said, that we should force homes on areas that clearly do not want such a high number, and demolish them in areas that have the potential to attract more people; they are quality homes, and it sometimes costs £60,000 to demolish a home in pathfinder scheme areas. The Government have the overall balance of the sustainable communities plan wrong, particularly with respect to the M11 corridor and cities such as Liverpool.

To focus on the M11 corridor, some of the greatest concerns that have been expressed to me by council leaders such as Lorna Spenceley of Harlow or Alan Dean of Uttlesford are about lack of local democratic involvement. Hon. Members have this morning talked about the need for elected representatives and local communities to have a real say, so that the decisions are local ones, not imposed ones.

It is bizarre that we spent 18 months passing the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004, which the Government told us would set up new local development frameworks, with community involvement statements and so on, but at the same time a plan is being pushed forward to override all that. It is nonsense. A different approach would be to persuade and incentivise people and to involve them in planning.

For example, it is clear that there are small villages and market towns in parts of the M11 corridor that are prepared to accept some housing. There is no doubt about that. The people there see a need for local housing and regeneration and a need to make vulnerable rural settlements sustainable. However, that is a matter of an affordable housing programme—one that is diffused, not focused in one or two areas.

Mr. Heald: I recently discussed this matter with Councillor Mike Carver, who is the leader of East Hertfordshire council, and Councillor F. John Smith, who is the leader of North Hertfordshire council. They made the point that only about 60 per cent. of the housing in question is being provided to meet local need. About 40 per cent. of it is being provided on the basis that the Government want to attract people into our area. Can the hon. Gentleman understand why they would want to do that?

Mr. Davey: There is a concern—although I am not sure that it has been expressed in these terms this morning—that Stansted, for example, will attract huge amounts of development. The Government are trying to plan houses for an extension of an airport that is not wanted by local people, which is probably the most unsustainable form of transport infrastructure imaginable and which is not the top priority for the area. The whole idea is perverse.

Mr. Heald: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can help me solve the mystery of why the East of England Development Agency thinks that we need about 500,000 new homes, on the basis of a second runway at Stansted, but the east of England regional assembly also thinks that we want 500,000 new homes, yet does not take account of the second runway. How does the hon. Gentleman think that that happened?

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to describe me as an expert earlier, but he was in danger of going beyond my detailed knowledge of parts of the proposal. I am afraid that I cannot address the quandary that he raises. I do not know whether he was asking a rhetorical question, but I take the point about the kinds of homes that are needed in such areas.

One of the problems with the sustainable communities plan is that we have adopted a top-down, predict-and-provide approach towards the homes that are needed. There has not been a bottom-up linking with the question of who will live there, what types of homes people actually want and what is the housing need there now.

The evidence that I have seen suggests that there are problems in rural communities and market town communities with people who are hidden homeless—adults still living at home and older people wishing to downsize yet facing a lack of available properties. A sustainable approach that worked with the community would be based on a different way of thinking about the types of houses that are needed and where they should be sited. That is why local government should be involved. If the decisions are taken based on a report by Professor Barker or some analysis by the ODPM, we are likely to get things wrong, because we will not be focusing on local needs and the local situation.

I have talked to local councillors in the region and it is interesting that some say that there are small villages crying out for a little bit of affordable housing—on exception sites, for example. There is huge local support in some places for perhaps half a dozen or a dozen homes, to support the local services—the post office, pub or school. Some services in such areas are not overstretched and need more people to support them.

If the Government had taken that approach—building up from little pockets—they could probably have provided a solution that did not extend to the 500,000 homes proposed in some of the plans that hon. Members have mentioned. The Government could have dealt with the need in those areas and provided real sustainable community planning.

Mr. Prisk: The hon. Gentleman is rightly highlighting a number of issues, not least the democratic deficit and the ability of local people to get involved. Does he share my view that it is time to scrap the regional assemblies?

Mr. Davey: That was a good try. There is a case for having some sort of body that takes a wider view, and I can give an example from the area. There is concern that some local authorities are saying that homes for the workers who will be needed for the Cambridge science arc development should be built in other local authority areas. There is a need for local people to come together, across local authorities. There is therefore a role for a body such as the regional assembly.

The assemblies should be far more accountable, although we cannot now look to directly elected regional assemblies—the buck has passed on that model. However, I am concerned that the current regional assemblies have people on them who have vested interests that are not covered by Nolan requirements for declaration and people who are not accountable in any way—indirectly or otherwise. There is a case for a big reform of regional assemblies to ensure that they are better linked to local people. The need for a strategic view on some of the issues is important for local people. If things do not come from them, they will come from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. That is the real concern. So, people who are talking about getting rid of regional assemblies are talking about giving more power to the Deputy Prime Minister.

[Mr. Davey]

Mr. Prisk: People in the M11 area, and in my constituency in particular, are looking for someone who will give back powers over what is built and where to the people of Hertfordshire. Is that not what we should do?

Mr. Davey: I believe that some of the planning powers that were given up to the regional planning boards under the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004 should be handed back down to county councils, and we pressed that position in the other place.

Mr. Prisk: Some of them.

Mr. Davey: Some of them came down from the ODPM to the regional planning boards under that Act and some came up from county councils. Therefore, it depends which powers we are talking about.

When that legislation went through this place, we wanted the powers not to go up from county councils. We did not get support from Conservatives in the other place on that point, and the hon. Gentleman should be wary of that. We tried to stand firm, but, unfortunately, we did not get the support and the measure was included in the Act. We very much regret that, and we wish that we had had support from the hon. Gentleman's colleagues in the other place.

Mr. Heald: Surely the hon. Gentleman recognises that the only reason why the counties are even consulted now is that Conservative amendments were passed in the other place which provided for that to happen?

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman needs to be careful, because the powers that he talked about were a shoddy compromise. We wanted to ensure that county councils did not lose the powers at all, but they were taken up. We were prepared to stand and fight on that one. Unfortunately, his colleagues were not.

We can welcome some aspects of the M11 corridor development, particularly those around Harlow. I think that there is some cross-party support. Harlow, as a new town, has seen deterioration in its housing stock, and in some of its leisure services and social infrastructure. There is a real case for investment there. Harlow could benefit from extra homes and extra infrastructure investment.

The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford was right to warn that while regeneration and extra investment is needed, how that is done is crucial. North Harlow/ BP new town would not be sustainable. One must ensure that we are not being told where to put houses by oil companies; the local people must make the decisions.

I also want to focus a little more on infrastructure. As I said, the likelihood of railway investment is minimal. The investment funds that the Government have been putting forward for transport infrastructure are also minimal. There seems to be no real strategic long-term thinking about the infrastructure needs of the area—besides making it worse with the investment in Stansted. The Government must go back to the drawing board.

What Mr. Justice Sullivan said about the case on Stansted was interesting. He said that the Government had overstepped the mark by trying to specify all the detail about the second runway. They were not prepared to leave some of it to local government and they ignored the principle of subsidiarity. They should learn a lesson from that, and, in future, ensure that such infrastructure and transport decisions take account of local opinion.

However, when one is criticising the Government, one must put forward an alternative. That there has not been a clear alternative is my only criticism of what we have heard so far today. We must recognise that young people need homes, and that there is an affordable housing problem and some thought needs to be given to it. The Liberal Democrats have looked at a range of policies on using existing homes, buildings and land in our urban conurbations. We have looked at getting the tax incentives right and ensuring that the public sector uses its massive land holdings more effectively. There is a strong case for cutting VAT on repairs and conversions to give the private sector a real incentive to reuse buildings that are lying idle. I have such buildings in my constituency; they are a real eyesore and a waste of land. We need that alternative.

We also need to come up with innovative housing plans to ensure that the affordable housing that is built remains affordable and available to local people. My party has published its housing policies, and we have talked about mutual homes, about giving a boost to shared equity and about the golden share schemes that Liberal Democrat administrations have piloted in places such as south Shropshire. Our proposals provide a way of dealing with some of these problems that is far more sustainable and involves local elected representatives. There is time to think again on these key issues, and I hope that the Government will do so.

10.31 am

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) on bringing this important issue to the attention of the House. This is a debate about the environment and protecting the green belt; about local democracy and what my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) described as the need for a bottom-up, rather than a top-down approach to deciding such important matters; and about developing genuinely sustainable communities and the missed opportunity for urban and suburban regeneration.

My hon. Friends have made a convincing case. Could there be any better representatives of their respective constituencies than the three who spoke from the Conservative Benches? I doubt it very much. They have described the Government's plans as a savage attack on the character not only of the countryside, but of existing settlements. The figures that they quoted were stark. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford spoke of a 36 per cent. growth in population in his constituency, with 3,700 extra school places needed. My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford spoke of 14,000 new homes in his constituency and described the plans as unsustainable, unwanted and unfair.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) painted a dreadful picture, and the Minister will have been as shocked by it as you will have been, Mr. Deputy Speaker. He spoke of a sprawling, ugly, soulless conglomeration of hastily built properties, which will damage for ever the character of the beautiful part of our country that he represents. He told us that his constituency would require 300 more doctors over the next three years. I was appalled at the prospect of people in that part of Britain being in desperate circumstances but not being able to access the medial care that they needed.

Conservative Front Benchers share the views expressed by my hon. Friends. We also share those expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Sir Alan Haselhurst), who has been mentioned in the debate, and my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), who, in the interests of his constituents, is fighting a vigorous campaign against the Government's proposals to concrete over much of his constituency. Indeed, the Deputy Prime Minister wants to bulldoze the north of England and concrete over the south.

Resistance is not limited to the Opposition Benches, however. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Committee has considered the matter, and its damning indictments of the Government are worthy of amplification here. The Committee said that "the impact of such a housing programme on the environment could be unsustainable."

It also said:

"The impact of developing so many homes in the South East, one of the most densely populated regions in Europe, has not been fully assessed . . . The additional homes could place excessive demands on the environment, leading to the loss of green-field sites and excessive pressure on the water supply and other natural resources . . . The Government . . . has yet to estimate the costs of providing the transport links, health care, education and all the other facilities which new neighbourhoods require."

The Environmental Audit Committee was equally critical of the Government, saying that "the principal loser will be the environment."

It added that

"we deplore the absence of any reference to environmental protection".

It said that the Government had yet to produce a definition of sustainable communities. Imagine a sustainable communities plan with no real definition of sustainability or what such communities comprise.

Mr. Prisk: My hon. Friend is describing the problem eloquently, but perhaps I can cause him even more concern: such a definition is absent two years after the policy was announced.

Mr. Hayes: In my judgment, the Government announced this policy without assessing fully its likely impact. That is precisely what Labour-dominated Select Committees have concluded about their own Government's appalling policy. The Environmental Audit Committee said:

"There is disturbing evidence that the sum so far allocated for infrastructure funding will not be anything like sufficient to meet the requirement generated by the Growth Areas."

That criticism comes not only from Opposition Members; throughout the country, communities are beginning to realise what these proposals—the communities plan and the growth areas—mean for them, their communities and their quality of life. In the Medway area, local campaigners such as Mark Reckless, Tim Butcher and Anne Jobson are campaigning with local people against those prospects. My hon. Friends are campaigning in Essex and Hertfordshire, and in Harlow people such as Robert Halfon are taking up the campaign on behalf of local people. In Northampton, Brian Binley and others are doing so. People are leading this campaign across the country.

Mr. Heald: My hon. Friend should not forget Brooks Newmark, a good campaigner on this issue in Braintree.

Mr. Hayes: Indeed. I am hoping to visit Braintree and many of those other communities in the next couple of weeks to look at the work being done there.

There are alternatives, and they have been teased out of me by my hon. Friends. Of course, Conservatives believe that the provision of new housing could play an important part in building, regenerating and sustaining genuine communities, but for that to happen we must ensure that we have the right homes in the right places. An agreed settlement between central and local government on housing growth should balance the need for extra houses with a consideration of landscape and the character of existing settlements. That balance would lie at the heart of a genuinely sustainable housing and planning policy.

I shall pose a series of questions to the Minister. The Conservatives will scrap the communities plan and focus on incremental development of existing settlements. We will protect the green belt more than the Government have done—we could hardly protect it less; my hon. Friends have rightly identified abuse of the principle of the green belt—by putting in place more and tighter green belts. Why do the Government not reappraise the designation of brownfield sites? If 50 per cent. of all brownfield sites in the south-east that are intended for employment purposes were instead used for housing, it would yield 27,000 extra homes at current density levels.

As I said last week, Barratt Homes tells me that 80 per cent. of its new houses are already built on brownfield land. In the south and south-east, that figure is 90 per cent. The truth is that many more houses could be built on brownfield sites. We could help developers by: reforming the planning system sensibly; making more land available through re-designation; freeing-up public sector land; and lifting some of the burdens and regulations that hamper good practice and enterprise as only Labour Governments can.

Why do the Government not streamline the planning process for regenerative brownfield development by standardising the processes for gaining planning permission under section 106 agreements? Why will they not put in place fiscal incentives to bring empty homes back into use—there are 700,000 empty homes across the country, according to the Empty Homes Agency? Why will the Government not scrap the prescriptive bureaucratic standards that stifle innovation, hamper brownfield development and promote monotonous, uniform housing estates? We should emphasise quality of design, rather than compliance with Government diktats. Local authorities should be encouraged to acquire the skills to devise in communion with local communities and developers plans that satisfy the need for housing development without compromising the local environment and quality of life.

[Mr. Hayes]

Why will the Government not establish more and tighter green belts, and redefine suburban back gardens so that they are protected from undesirable development—town cramming, as it has become known under this Government? Why will they not extend the rural exceptions policy to allow small-scale expansion of villages with a mix of new homes, so that we have market housing cross-subsidising the social homes that can play such a useful part in servicing local needs? We must focus development where infrastructure can support it, so why will the Government not ensure that local authorities make infrastructure capacity a key factor in the development control process?

Today's debate has highlighted a Government policy that is undeliverable, unsustainable, unneeded and unwanted. Britain needs the right homes in the right places. It needs development on a human scale—incremental, organic, inspiring and shaped by local people. Britain needs to support house builders to regenerate urban and suburban Britain, and it needs to value the land and safeguard our countryside. There is a shining light at the end of this dark Labour tunnel, and the people of Hertfordshire, Essex and other communities across Britain will be able to bask in that light when this Government are driven from office and an enlightened housing and planning policy is put in place.

10.41 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) on securing this debate, which provides a useful opportunity to clarify some of the issues relating to the London-Stansted-Cambridge-Peterborough growth area, to our approach to achieving sustainable communities in the wider south-east and to the Government's position on key issues such as infrastructure and the environment, which are particular concerns in the east of England.

Hon. Members will be aware that I am constrained in what I can say at this stage, particularly about specific locations that they may have raised and about individual problems about which they may be concerned. That is the case because the draft east of England plan was published in December for public consultation. That consultation closes next Wednesday, and it is not appropriate for me to comment on the detailed issues or on specific locations at this stage.

Mr. Prisk: I should like to ask the Minister about that, although I do not want to delay the debate. It has come to light that that consultation is flawed. I hope that when it is concluded, she will accept from me an itemised list of ways in which my constituents have not been able to participate.

Yvette Cooper: If the hon. Gentleman wants to send us information, we shall certainly look at and try to address it, as we always do whenever hon. Members across the House raise concerns. I shall say a little more about the consultation and planning process shortly.

We need to be clear about our starting point: we need to provide more homes for families across the south-east. People are living longer and more people are living alone. Without more homes, people will not be able to live in the communities where they grew up and key workers will not be able to find homes in the communities where they need to work.

Mr. Heald: The need that the Minister has just outlined is a requirement for 60 per cent. of the houses in the east of England plan. Why must we have the other 40 per cent.?

Yvette Cooper: The problem faced by Conservative Members here is that they simply do not recognise the close links between the housing market, housing supply and the regional and national economy in this country. They need to recognise the importance of the links with economic growth and the need to support economic growth and prosperity in the region.

Mr. Burns: Will the Minister give way?

Yvette Cooper: I know that hon. Members want to ask me questions, but they have all had the chance to speak and I have a series of things to say in response. I shall take this last intervention, and then I shall have to make some progress.

Mr. Burns: I am very grateful to the Minister. To pick up on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), why has it been accepted that 2,500 of the houses that Chelmsford is expected to build are not to meet the current or future needs of local people, but to relieve pressure on house building in another part of the county?

Yvette Cooper: At this stage in the process, it would be inappropriate for me to comment on individual proposals or on specific locations. However, let me again remind the hon. Gentleman of the broad issues. More housing is needed in the eastern region, the south-east and London. We cannot ignore that fact. If we do, it will be to the detriment not only of those who want to get into the housing market but cannot afford to do so, but of our public services, because we will not be able to recruit the people whom we need if they cannot afford anywhere to live. Such an approach would also impact on the number of people who are homeless or in temporary accommodation and harm the economy, affecting the prosperity of the region and the nation.

We are already falling short of what is needed. In the past five years, 550,000 new households have formed in the wider south-east—London and the eastern and south-east regions—but fewer than 400,000 new homes have been built. In the past 10 years, 12.5 per cent. fewer houses have been built than in previous decades. The hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) spoke of allowing the housing market to work. Unfortunately, the evidence of the Barker review is that the housing market is not working in the way that is needed. The rising house prices across the country are not triggering the necessary increase in housing supply; they have not done so for 10 years. The issue needs to be confronted, and hon. Members must recognise that.

Mr. Hayes: The Minister has been generous in giving way, and I hope that she will agree that I was, too. She will understand that demand-side factors—things such as the relative unattractiveness of alternative investment vehicles, the level of borrowing secured against housing equity, the net migration into the country, as recognised by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, and interest rates—drive up house prices and keep them up. To address affordability by supply-side means would be to build countless houses. That would be neither sustainable nor deliverable, and it would take a very long time. Why does the Minister not address some of the demand-side factors?

Yvette Cooper: I know that Opposition Members have tried to maintain that the only problem in the housing market is on the demand side, and that the issue can somehow be resolved by demand-side measures. Of course, house prices are determined by the relationship between demand and supply, and there are issues in relation to housing as an investment good in various ways. Nevertheless, housing is also a critical consumption good. We cannot deny that; the Barker review was very clear about it.

Given a choice between the economic analysis of the Barker review, produced by a member of the Monetary Policy Committee, and the economic analysis of Conservative Front Benchers, with their previous record on economic policy making, I would go with Kate Barker. The Opposition have to recognise the relationship between the housing market and the economy, and the fact that the housing market is not delivering enough houses to meet need. That problem will get worse unless serious action is taken. The Conservative party's position of simply abandoning the sustainable communities plan, making huge cuts in the sustainable communities budget and thinking that the matter can be resolved in an incremental way is a position for people living on another planet. It is not realistic, given the scale of the problem and its impact on homelessness, house prices, public services and the regional economy.

The east and the south-east already face serious housing pressures. Hon. Members have referred to the need to recruit more doctors and public service professionals. That is a serious issue, but we will have far greater problems recruiting nurses, teachers and health professionals across the board if we do not address the housing problems across the region. Several speakers, including the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey), have said that we need to offer alternatives, but the Opposition parties are not offering alternatives. Of course we need to do more to increase development on brownfield sites. We have already substantially increased the amount of development on such sites, and we need to do everything that we can to increase that development.

The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) mentioned building more on employment land. I agree that we need to reappraise employment land in many areas, but he will agree that we should also recognise the need to maintain it and not simply develop dormitories without employment land closely linked to the development of new housing. Nevertheless, we agree that employment land in many locations may be more appropriate for housing. That is exactly why we made changes to planning policy guidance note 3, which was published earlier this year, to require local authorities to do that. So we agree that other measures also need to be taken, but we simply cannot avoid the important need to expand housing in the southern and south-eastern regions.

Several hon. Members have voiced concerns on behalf of their constituents. The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford referred to the concerns of his constituents in East Hertfordshire, which is the least deprived district in the east of England and the eighth least deprived in England as a whole. Like every other part of the east and south-east, it has seen a significant rise in house prices, which are a problem for people who live there and have an impact on the ability to recruit public sector workers. That is why all districts throughout the region need to work together to address the matter. Opposition Members have also voiced concerns about the regional planning process.

Mr. Prisk: I fully accept, as does East Herts district council, the need to provide homes for people who are described as being on lower incomes and as needing affordable homes, but the independent housing survey 2004 showed that we would need to build 594 homes per annum over the next 20 years or so to accommodate all the households that will be needed. Yet the Government's plan suggests that we should build at twice that rate. Why?

Yvette Cooper: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Government's proposals were based on analysis of the overall need to increase housing throughout the region. That is what we need to do. We cannot simply sit by and allow the problems with the housing market, homelessness and economic constraints to continue. I cannot reiterate enough to Opposition Members the importance of the relationship between housing and the overall regional economy. We cannot allow the situation to continue; we need to recognise the importance of responding to housing market pressures throughout the area, not simply in individual districts operating in isolation.

Hon. Members talked about the regional planning process. The east of England plan was developed by local partners, and it will be tested by an independent public examination. The plans are not being imposed by the Government through the back door; they are being developed through an extensive and rigorous process that is open to public scrutiny. The whole process started back in September 2002 with community workshops, stakeholder events and consultation on options.

[Yvette Cooper]

The East of England regional assembly—70 per cent. of its members are local authority members, the majority of whom are Conservative—has worked on a draft, and it has done more work on the London, Stansted, Cambridge and Peterborough area. The public consultation began in December and will end in the middle of next week. The next stage is that an independent panel will review all the issues and hold an examination in public.

Hon. Members asked detailed questions on issues ranging from the water supply to the impact on particular locations and on particular roads. Those matters, and others such as airport noise or the regeneration of particular towns, are exactly the sorts of things that the examination in public needs to address. All such issues need to be properly addressed and openly scrutinised and discussed by the examination in public. It is right that that should happen and that we should go through that process. It is proposed that, in early 2006, the panel would publish a report recommending amendments to the draft regional spatial strategy. There would then be a further opportunity for consultation on the revisions. There are considerable opportunities for discussion and debate across the region and at local level.

I should also make it clear that we shall not support housing growth at any cost. New housing must respect the environment and be more sustainable than in the past. That is why, as I said, 67 per cent. of new homes are now built on brownfield land, compared with just 56 per cent. in 1997. We need to continue with brownfield development.

In 2003, the average density of new homes was 33 per hectare, compared with 25 between 1996 and 2001. In the east of England, about 20,000 homes were built every year between 1996 and 2001, at an average density of 22 homes per hectare. If those homes had been built at a density of 30 homes per hectare, another 7,200 homes could have been built every year on the same land. We are committed to building homes more sustainably and are consulting, for example, on changes to the building regulations to deliver a 25 per cent. improvement in energy efficiency.

Of course, this is not just a matter of individual homes. Homes should be in communities that are more sustainable, and close to jobs and the services that people need, so that people can be less dependent on cars and so that we do not repeat the low-density, car-dependent suburban sprawl of previous generations.

Mr. Heald: Is the Minister saying that we should go back to the flats and tower blocks of the 1960s, which were such a disaster? I thought that that was the lesson of the past.

Yvette Cooper: Of course we need to avoid the mistakes of the 1960s and the 1970s, and of many previous decades and generations. We also need to ensure that developments use improved design. There are obvious design changes that can substantially improve community spirit in an area, as well as the residents' quality of life.

We have made a clear commitment that every English region will maintain or increase the area currently designated as green belt in local plans. The fundamental aim remains to keep land around urban areas permanently open and to prevent urban sprawl. In some exceptional circumstances it may be appropriate to consider whether the most sustainable option may be to revise green belt boundaries; that would depend on transport links and the location of jobs and services. However, those instances should be the exceptions. The east of England has been considering that.

Mr. Prisk: Is the metropolitan green belt in my constituency safe under the Labour Government—yes or no?

Yvette Cooper: The hon. Gentleman will know that I cannot comment on specific constituency issues and areas in this debate, because of the regional planning process that we are going through. I have made it very clear that our commitment to the green belt across the region remains important. We should be aware that the green belt has increased as a result of Government policies, in contrast to substantial green-belt reductions in many places under the last Conservative Government. We should not forget that.

Hon. Members asked specific questions about funding for services. Funding allocation for public services such as health and education must respond to housing growth. We are already announcing substantial new funding packages for growth areas. For example, there is funding to enable the NHS to increase local service capacity and to ensure that the Department for Education and Skills responds to planned housing growth in forecasting pupil numbers. That is in addition to substantial extra investment in those services—investment that Opposition Members would cut across the board, not only for the growth areas, but throughout the country.

The Opposition need to recognise the need for additional housing and for economic prosperity. It is a shame that they still refuse to understand the importance of economic prosperity and of the links between the housing market and the regional economy. That shows that their approach would be not simply to cut houses, but to cut economic growth.

British Cellophane

11 am

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): I am delighted to have secured this debate on British Cellophane in Bridgwater. Its name is, in fact, Innovia Films, but it is known to all and sundry as British Cellophane. I wish, unusually, to thank a few people before I start my speech, the first being the Labour candidate for the constituency of Bridgwater at the next general election, Mr. Matthew Burchell, which may seem slightly strange. He works for the Leader of the House of Commons, and without his help it would have been a lot harder to reach the point at which we are today.

I wish to thank the Transport and General Workers Union for its help, especially Mel Dando. I wish also to thank John Bloomfield, the managing director of Innovia Films, Bridgwater. He has supplied an enormous amount of information. When the news was announced, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was incredibly helpful and made it clear that she would do all that she could to help.

British Cellophane has a long and honourable history. It has an enormous background of industrial muscle and might in Bridgwater. It came there more than 50 years ago. I suspect that members of the community did not mind about the smell and were not worried about it environmentally, but just wanted manufacturing capacity. Bridgwater is the only industrial town in the west country. Over the long term, the work force at British Cellophane has been reduced, but it has always had outstanding productivity and an outstanding relationship with its employees and given outstanding help to the town at all levels. I believe that there has only been one industrial dispute and not once throughout its time in Bridgwater has Cellophane been anything other than a massive asset.

Thirty or forty years ago, Cellophane produced about 500,000 tonnes of cellophane. Cellophane is on everything. In fact, you are probably drinking out of a cellophane container at the moment, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is a massively important commodity throughout the world. However, over the years, its production has reduced from about 500,000 tonnes to 60,000 tonnes. The commodity has to be produced in highly productive, motivated and profitable plants.

Believe it or not, 124 different types of cellophane are made in Bridgwater. There is an enormous number of different ways to use the film. That shows the level that cellophane has reached. It is a film that can be used for almost anything and it is now in use every day, almost without parallel. However, problems have occurred. Over many years, there have been changes of company and ownership and, in the past few years, the company has changed dramatically. It was bought by Candell Investments. I want to talk about three of its five plants. Two plants are in Britain and one is in America. The two in Britain are productive, motivated plants—one is in the north and one is in Bridgwater.

I wish to dwell on the plant in Kansas. Over the past few years, Cellophane has felt the strength of the pound. I do not expect the Minister to be able to solve that problem overnight. We know that it is a problem for all manufacturing companies in the United Kingdom. I know that the Minister agrees that manufacturing matters strongly in this country. The problem is something that successive Governments have wrestled with and not always been able to solve because of outside forces, such as the strength of the pound, dollar and euro, but manufacturing should be protected at all times. We cannot allow it to disappear.

Last year in Bridgwater, we lost Federal Modal; 400 jobs went to Poland because we could not compete. The Government were helpful and, although we have ongoing problems with the pension fund, I cannot fault them for what happened. However, I am greatly worried about the situation in Kansas. I hope that the Minister can help. Kansas state legislators have paised an enormous amount of money to the plant in Kansas—we are talking about millions of dollars, not a few hundred thousand. They voted publicly to give public money to a plant to enable it to undermine us in the United Kingdom. It does not stop there. The plant is unproductive and does not make a profit. Why would one give money to a plant that does not make a profit and is not productive, whether it is in China, Australia or America?

I hope that the Minister agrees that it is worrying that British jobs in a profitable, highly productive plant are being put under threat by a plant that is not profitable, not productive and makes about half the types of cellophane that we do. It cannot even keep up with our production levels, yet we are losing to that plant money that should come to us.

Today at 3.30 pm, a deputation from the Transport and General Workers Union and Glyn Ford, the MEP for the south-west, are meeting Peter Mandelson in Europe to discuss this matter. I know that the Minister is fully aware of that, and I am sure that she has been fully briefed by her staff. The subsidies are unfair trade, unfair dumping and the use of unfair competition against profitable plants, and we should not allow that to happen. I hope that the Minister will give some assurance that, in this world of free trade, the World Trade Organisation should be asked to consider this matter, either through the EU or the British Government—ideally both.

Innovia Films has started a 90-day consultation. Last night we had a meeting with Sedgemoor district council, which was attended by all the political parties—well, both of us, there were no Liberals present—the chief executive of Innovia Films, Mr. David Beeby, and Mr. John Bloomfield, the managing director at Bridgwater, at which they laid out their stall as to what they need. This is the crux of the matter, and why we are here today. The Minister is aware that we have a meeting in just over a week to try to move the matter on.

One of the biggest costs at the plant is the production of power. There is a power station on site, as there has always been. If one drives down the M5, one will see the chimney of the power station. However, the power station is old. I am sure that the Minister knows that a few years ago British Cellophane paid 12p a therm for gas whereas today it pays 116p a therm. That gives some idea of the difference in the cost of the energy that it needs to produce.

I have here some figures from John Hall Associates, which show the difference between Dutch and French production and levels of cost as of today. Ours are enormously higher—about a third. I am happy to give the Minister those figures after the debate. That shows that Innovia Films, or British Cellophane, is finding it hard to compete in the market. In yesterday's Financial Times, there was a quote—it has just dropped off the desk, so I will not hunt around for it—saying that energy costs are making it so hard for companies in this country to compete that they are considering moving abroad for that reason alone.

[Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger]

I will return to the issue of the power station, but there is also a problem with water. The plant uses a massive amount of water in its production process. Last year, the cost of water at the plant went up by £200,000 in one year. If one takes 2000 as a base year, the cost of water for British Cellophane has gone up by 25 per cent. in four or five years. It gives some idea of the cost to the company that it now hopes to buy in its energy services. Never mind the actual cellophane itself—we are talking just about production costs.

What can I ask the Minister to do to help? We need a new power station. Sedgemoor district council has a proposal on the table for a wood-burning power station. That would create not only 20 jobs but enough power to look after British Cellophane, put 15 per cent. back on to the grid, use 145,000 tonnes of wood that normally goes into landfill and help the Government to hit their targets on biodiversity, biofuels and renewables. I say that with four nuclear reactors down the road at Hinkley Point.

We have the opportunity to do something special in Somerset. The power plant is there, and there will be no change of use. If we could get the permission, it could be done. However, we need an indication from the Government, either through the regional development agency or directly, or from Europe on energy production, that that could happen. The company needs to know that we are listening and doing what we can—I mean all of us—to help.

It will be an enormous challenge. Every year, £20 million goes into the economy from British Cellophane—in wages and direct and indirect goods. It has been the lifeblood of Bridgwater in many ways. Going down the M5, it can be smelt at every turn. However, that is British Cellophane; that is what we are proud of. On Saturday, on the march organised by the Transport and General Workers Union, I marched with Matthew Burchell together with hundreds of people, from all walks of life, in Bridgwater, a manufacturing town whose lifeblood is making things. We need Government help.

It is rare that an MP pleads with the Government, but I am doing so on behalf of Bridgwater. I have laid out a stall of what we need. We have deputations going to Europe and people who are prepared to sign petitions in their hundreds, and I hope that the Minister will listen. I give another pledge to the Government: we will do what we have to. Sedgemoor district council has cut business rates to the plant straight away. Although it can give no direct money, the county council has passed a resolution to do what it can to help. Last night, at the meeting, the RDA said that it would do everything that it could to help via government, directly and indirectly. The challenge, Minister, is to look after manufacturing per se—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is speaking directly to the Minister; when he should be addressing me.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: I stand castigated. I think that you can tell, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that there is a certain passion in this situation, and I apologise.

As you are aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and as the Minister is aware, we are now in the 90-day consultation period, which will end in the middle of May. If we get this right and get the right feedback from the Government, we can consider the proposals. The plant and the company are prepared to do so. That is the challenge that we face.

11.13 am

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Jacqui Smith): I start by congratulating the hon. Gentleman, not only on obtaining this debate but on the obvious passion that he has shown and the action that he has already taken in talking to my right hon. Friends and pressing the case very strongly.

I also thank him for the deserved and well-natured credit that he gave to Matthew Burchell, the Labour prospective parliamentary candidate in Bridgwater and to the T and G, which has also strongly lobbied the Government on the issue.

I would like to start by expressing my sympathy for the position in which the hon. Gentleman's constituents find themselves. It is certainly the case that the company's recent decision to begin consultations with a possible view to closure of the Bridgwater site is disappointing and distressing news to those people who, as the hon. Gentleman has pointed out, have in many cases put a lifetime of commitment into the plant. It is because we understand the seriousness of the issue and the impact on the local community that as soon as we learned that Innovia was considering the future configuration of its manufacturing operations, officials from my Department and from the South West of England Regional Development Agency immediately visited the company to understand the background and to explore what assistance might be available.

The hon. Gentleman emphasises the importance of manufacturing, as I frequently do. The company has received assistance from the Process Industries Centre for Manufacturing Excellence, an organisation that promotes the development of lean manufacturing, and was established with financial aid from the Department of Trade and Industry. However, we wished to see whether there was anything further we could do to assist the company. We also wanted to understand the background to any decisions that might be made. Part of the background is the current situation for cellophane production. Although the hon. Gentleman made a strong case for the continued importance of cellophane, cellophane production has been in decline for many years, as alternative products have been developed to meet the needs of the market. At the peak of demand, there were 23 production units in Europe and 15 in the United States, and they were operated by a number of different companies. Today, Innovia supplies

70 per cent. of the world market—outside Japan—of cellophane products from only three manufacturing sites. As the hon. Gentleman said, one of those sites is in the USA, another is at Wigton in north-west England, and the other is at Bridgwater. Despite that, we understand that Innovia's production capacity is currently 50 per cent. higher than demand for the product. Put simply; there is a continuing decline in worldwide demand for cellophane products, and no company can continue producing more than the market requires. It is that dramatic change in the market that is forcing the company to consider rationalisation of its production capacity.

Of course, the company will need to base its decision on any rationalisation on sound commercial grounds, including the relative strength of the remaining markets, product range, proximity and time to the markets served, plant condition, and operating costs. As the hon. Gentleman points out, account will also have to be taken not only of specific financial assistance but of the whole framework of support that may be available in different areas. Alongside the support that is already provided, the local community, the local authority—Sedgemoor district council—and local agencies are making major efforts to find a solution that retains the manufacturing jobs in the area. I understand that the district council is exploring whether the company could pay less in business rates.

As recently as last night, the regional development agency—the prime agency in the region for economic development and business support—met with the hon. Gentleman, and senior representatives of the company and the community. Today, the hon. Gentleman raised important points about power and the power plant. He also mentioned the pressure that manufacturers are currently feeling in respect of energy prices. I do not dispute that that is a considerable challenge for manufacturers, but I slightly dispute the angle that the hon. Gentleman took. He put us in a very bad position in respect of international competition, but the DTI estimates that UK gas prices remain below the EU median in 2004. However, it is an important issue. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry met representatives of energy-intensive users last December, and why my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and E-Commerce has had meetings to discuss the issue with some of the most affected companies. It is also why I discussed it recently with the Engineering Employers Federation. We are determined to find ways both to make sure that the market operates effectively to maintain competitiveness in energy prices and to ensure support for manufacturers.

The hon. Gentleman made a specific point about the development of a new power plant at Bridgwater. I want to look carefully at the figures that he and the company have forwarded to us about that challenge. I also want to set that in the context of the considerable support that the Government have already provided for alternative sources of energy, including exemption from the climate change levy for fuel inputs and electricity outputs from good-quality combined heat and power, eligibility for enhanced capital allowances, and a reduction in VAT to 5 per cent. for certain grant-funded domestic micro-CHP.

More recent developments include securing the future of the community energy programme until at least March 2008 with a total funding of £60 million, creating incentives to develop innovative products and putting in place shortly revised guidance for power station developers, obliging them to consider fully the options for CHP and community heating.

I also understand that within that framework the particular situation in Bridgwater is important. While I cannot give the hon. Gentleman any undertakings this morning, I can ensure that across government we will carefully examine the issue and see whether or not further support is available.

Let us be clear about one important point. We are not discussing a company that is deserting the UK—far from it. The company has its group headquarters in Wigton in the north-west, where it employs 850 people in both manufacturing and research and development. In 2002, it invested €12 million in a new global research and development centre at Wigton. That was in addition to more than €100 million invested in production facilities at the Wigton site during the past decade. There is a commitment to UK manufacturing, although that is not, I accept, a comfort to the hon. Gentleman, who is rightly concerned about the Bridgwater site in his constituency.

The hon. Gentleman raised the particular issue of the funding that, it is argued, the US authorities and local authorities in Kansas are providing to the American plant. He rightly highlights the fact that the route for identifying whether or not that complies with World Trade Organisation rules is through the European Commission, which, of course, negotiates for the European Union on such issues.

I was pleased to hear about the meeting that is taking place with the Commissioner for Trade, Peter Mandelson, to whom the hon. Gentleman referred. I can also assure him that my officials have been talking to the Commission to confirm whether the US support complies with WTO rules. We want to maintain that contact so that we can interrogate the facts about the extent of the support in the US and whether it constitutes unfair trade under WTO rules.

So, while it is hard for those involved, this is, in some ways, a story of change and of companies in the UK responding to such change. In manufacturing—even manufacturing within this particular area of support—one of the difficulties with the market is that as we innovate and develop new products that compete with cellophane, there is a change in the way such manufacturing happens. There is not, incidentally, a shift of manufacturing out of the UK.

Other companies in the UK are producing the new alternatives that are replacing cellophane. For example, last September, my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade and Investment formally opened a new £65 million investment by the Japanese company Nippon Gohsei at Saltend, near Hull. That plant uses cutting-edge technology to produce a new environmentally-friendly polymer used in the food packaging industry, 90 per cent. of which is exported to Europe. That, once again, creates new jobs in the UK.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: The Minister is right in everything that she says, except that we are talking about a profitable and highly-productive plant. It has done everything to change and it outperforms the Americans by far. It produces more and it produces better quality. I accept what she says, but I take issue on one point. The plant has done everything to stay profitable and we should not allow it to be sacrificed simply because an American plant can get away with something that we cannot. Does she agree?

Jacqui Smith: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, which is why I said two things. We need to investigate the extent of the aid being offered in the US and ensure that we do everything possible to assist the UK plants, particularly the Bridgwater plant. However, we also need to do that with an understanding of the market. Where there is massive overcapacity, rationalisation is needed. The hon. Gentleman is quite right to argue the case for the plant in his constituency. I certainly hope that we can create and maintain jobs in the sector in the UK. As a Government, we will do what we can to support that, but in the end those decisions must be taken by the company, taking into account the market situation and a range of commercial factors.

We will continue to provide support for manufacturing, through the manufacturing advisory service and the investment that we are putting into science and innovation. For example, in the 2004 spending review we provided an extra £515 million in new money to boost science and innovation. Those incentives are being provided at a time when the UK is enjoying the longest period of sustained low and stable inflation since the 1960s, with interest rates close to historically low levels.

The effect of that is obvious. Gross domestic product has grown strongly over the past year, as has manufacturing output. As the hon. Gentleman said, we need to put in place the framework to enable UK manufacturers to compete. We need to add specific financial assistance to that, whether it is for innovation or is put into those areas that have been identified for selective investment.

We must ensure that local economies are doing as well as possible. I know that the hon. Gentleman will share my satisfaction that the economy of Somerset is now performing better than the national average. For example, unemployment is 1.3 per cent., which is relatively low compared to regional and national averages. More specifically, in Bridgwater more than 1 million sq ft of new factory space is being built at the recently opened 100-acre Express Park, less than a mile from the Innovia site.

At the end of last year, a planning application was submitted for an additional 50-acre employment site just two miles south of Bridgwater. Further from Bridgwater, there are two new development sites, at Glastonbury and Taunton. The Glastonbury development alone is expected to create 850 jobs, on a 35-acre site. To help with training, the South West of England Regional Development Agency has assisted in the establishment of an £11 million training programme through the Somerset skills alliance, as well as a single regeneration budget programme and a "Building Communities" pilot project in Bridgwater.

My argument is that, although the Government cannot always influence or determine commercial decisions about rationalisation and plant closure, we can provide support where possible and maintain the macro-economic framework to allow the hon. Gentleman's constituency to flourish and ensure that there are jobs for local people. That is not to diminish in any way the painful position in which Innovia's Bridgwater work force find themselves, through no fault of their own. However, in that specific case a number of both local and national agencies are already engaged in seeking ways of assisting those who will be affected if—I stress "if", because I do not think that the decision has been taken yet—a decision is taken to close the Innovia plant.

I know that the cellophane plant in Bridgwater has been a key feature of the area for several generations. The announcement that it is being considered for closure was bound to be sad news for the employees, their families and the local community. I can only give the hon. Gentleman and that community my assurance that officials at local, regional and national levels will continue to explore what assistance might be provided.

11.29 am

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

Non-Proliferation Review

2 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I also thank Mr. Speaker for selecting this issue for debate. The non-proliferation treaty review conference is due to be held in New York in May.

First, I should declare an interest. Before everyone gets too excited, I should say that I do not have shares in BAE Systems, Boeing or anything like that. I am, however, a lifetime member of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. I am also the chairman of the parliamentary group on CND, although it has not yet been declared an all-party group, and we are awaiting Tory Members to make up the numbers. Finally, I am a vice-chairman of CND and a member of its national council.

The issue could not be more important for the future of the world. Nuclear weapons have been a cloud over us all throughout my lifetime and that of everybody in the Chamber, and that has been the case ever since the first bombs were exploded in Hiroshima and Nagasaki in 1945. Efforts were constantly made to obtain some degree of disarmament through controls, test bans and the various arguments that were put forward internationally. The non-proliferation treaty of 1970 was seen as an enormous step forward and a way to get us out of the dangers of a nuclear holocaust. The five declared nuclear weapons states—the United States, the then Soviet Union, Britain, France and China—all agreed to the treaty, which would do two things. First, it would prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons and nuclear technology outside the five nuclear states. Secondly, those five states would, in the longer term, disarm. In other words, we would begin to see the end of nuclear weapons.

The conference this May is part of the five-yearly review process, and this debate is intended to allow hon. Members to express their views about it. Above all, however, the Minister will be able to tell us what stance the Government will take at the review conference and whether we shall see a development of the exciting statement that was made after the 2000 conference.

Before I go into that, however, we should reflect for a moment on the proliferation that has taken place since 1970. Several states now have nuclear weapons; some of them have a delivery capability, and many would have the ability to manufacture many more nuclear weapons if they were minded to do so. This year's conference is therefore not simply a five-yearly review: it is an important watershed. Are we to stop the proliferation of nuclear weapons by following the two pillars of the 1970 treaty—disarmament by the five states plus disarmament by non-declared nuclear weapons states?

We should remember that one pariah state developed nuclear weapons and gave them up. Under apartheid, South Africa developed nuclear weapons, but with the end of apartheid and the installation of the African National Congress Government under Nelson Mandela, it renounced them and helped to make the continent of Africa nuclear-free. We should applaud South Africa for that and recognise that the moral stature that it enjoys in the world is the product not only of the end of apartheid, but of the fact that it is not threatening anybody.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): May I ask my hon. Friend to make a similar point about Argentina? At one time, it had at the least plans to move towards nuclear weapons, but it gave them up because it realised that, rather than making Latin America more peaceful, nuclear weapons would massively destabilise relations with Brazil and, indeed, around the globe. So, Argentina also deserves some credit.

Jeremy Corbyn: Absolutely; that is a good point, which I endorse. Argentina, too, was developing a capability, although I do not think that it had got as far as South Africa. However, it gave up that capability.

Other states have been less promising in that respect. We know that Israel has developed nuclear weapons and that it has a delivery capability and an advanced missile system. We know that because Mordecai Vanunu had the courage to tell the truth about Israel's nuclear weapons and subsequently spent the best part of two decades in prison as a result. He is still under control orders in Jerusalem, which we hope will be lifted on 21 April. He will then be free to come to the House and tell us the truth about the nuclear threat in that region.

Of the other countries that have nuclear weapons, India and Pakistan are in negotiation about no first use and, I hope, possible long-term disarmament, although when President Musharraf addressed a meeting in the House, which I and many colleagues attended, I was not encouraged by his remarks about nuclear weapons. Given the poverty in India and Pakistan, it is unconscionable that either country would spend the resources that are required for developing a nuclear delivery system when they should be developing education, housing and health and making all other necessary social developments in their countries.

Clearly, North Korea has developed nuclear weapons and, tragically, has withdrawn from the NPT system. I hope that the negotiations by all the countries involved will bring North Korea back. The Minister's colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell), is not here today, but he went to North Korea to engage in that discussion. I hope that his efforts will be redoubled, so that there is no prospect of another war breaking out on the Korean peninsula.

The issue of Iranian nuclear weapons is discussed loudly, principally by the Pentagon and others, although Mohamed el-Baradei, the United Nations weapons inspector, has made several visits to Iran and has confirmed that he thinks that it has ceased the development of enriched uranium that could lead to the development of weapons-grade material and that it is taking part in negotiations. I hope that, when the Minister replies, he can tell us that he supports that process, too, and that we will continue engagement with Iran to ensure that there is no development of nuclear weapons in the area, and that we will have no more of the bellicose statements from either President Bush or Secretary of State Rice in which they seem to be overtly threatening Iran. Surely enough life has already been lost in Iraq, without threatening Iran. Disarmament must be the order of the day.

[Jeremy Corbyn]

Mohamed el-Baradei, the UN weapons inspector, made some interesting comments in the run-up to the NPT. He said:

"It is clear that recent events have placed the NPT and the regime supporting it under unprecedented stress, exposing some of its inherent limitations and pointing to areas that need to be adjusted".

He then proposed seven steps that would strengthen the NPT regime and, with it, world security. He said:

"Some of the needed fixes can be made in May, but only if governments are ready to act."

Those steps, which would not require amending the treaty, include a five-year moratorium on building new facilities for uranium enrichment, plutonium separation and materials that can be used for nuclear weapons production. He went on:

"There is no compelling reason for building more of these proliferation-sensitive facilities. The nuclear industry already has more than enough capacity to fuel its power plants and research facilities".

We should listen carefully to Mohamed el-Baradei because he has important things to say, more so because he was not listened to properly about Iran and has put a huge effort into Iraq and North Korea. He is a force for good in the world and a force for peace. He should be treated with the respect that he deserves.

Item 6 of the final document that was referred to at the 2000 conference states:

"An unequivocal undertaking by the nuclear-weapon States to accomplish the total elimination of their nuclear arsenals leading to nuclear disarmament, to which all States parties are committed under article VI."

That was a very welcome statement. The declaration put forward a series of proposals that included:

"Further efforts by the nuclear-weapon States to reduce their nuclear arsenals unilaterally; increased transparency by the nuclear-weapon States with regard to the nuclear weapons capabilities . . . reduction of non-strategic nuclear weapons, based on unilateral initiatives . . . Concrete agreed measures to further reduce the operational status of nuclear weapons systems; a diminishing role for nuclear weapons in security policies to minimize the risk that these weapons will ever be used and to facilitate the process of their total elimination".

and

"The engagement as soon as appropriate of all nuclear-weapon States in the process leading to the total elimination of their nuclear weapons."

Those are important items, and important to remember as we go to that conference, which will take place just a few weeks before the 60th anniversary of the explosion of the world's first nuclear weapons at Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945.

In some ways, the conference ought to be held in Hiroshima. Those who believe that nuclear weapons provide security, safety or a solution of any kind to the world's problems should think for a moment of all those who died in 1945, of all the resources that have been wasted since then on developing nuclear weapons and of those who continue to die from the cancerous fallout from those explosions or from nuclear tests that have taken place since 1945.

The British Government have to face up to some serious, very important questions; any British Government would have to. We are signatories to the 1970 treaty, therefore we should not be developing any new nuclear weapons. I understand that the Trident submarine system is coming to the end of its usable life. I should like to hear a declaration from the Government that when that happens, the system will not be replaced and that we see it as our obligation under the 1970 treaty, to which we adhered, to get rid of our nuclear weapons at that stage.

Work is going on at Aldermaston on what I believe to be the preparatory development of a new generation of nuclear weapons. I should like to hear from the Government about that work, about what weapons are being developed and about the United States' participation in that process. We are required by the treaty to pursue a nuclear-free world, so are we developing a new generation of nuclear weapons and prepared to start the development of a new delivery system or are we going to play our part in nuclear arms reduction? It is all very well for us to lecture the rest of the world on the danger of nuclear proliferation and on how bad nuclear weapons are—it is a danger, and they are appalling—yet we ourselves are developing them and continuing to develop and hold them.

I recognise that the number of nuclear warheads has been reduced. However, I also recognise that under the NATO umbrella we have our own weapons that are theoretically independent of the United States. Under the NATO treaty system, nuclear weapons are also held in non-declared countries such as Belgium, the Netherlands and Germany, because they are part of the NATO command structure. We need to be clear about how that fits with what we are trying to achieve.

I want others to take part in this debate, so I shall conclude by drawing attention to the preparatory work for this year's conference in New York, which gives us an enormous opportunity to move forward. There was a great deal of hope around after the 2000 conference. In his contribution to that conference, my right hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), then a Foreign Office Minister, made it clear that he saw Britain as on the fast track towards disarmament and as playing our full part in that.

We have not heard such welcome statements from the Secretary of State for Defence or any Defence Ministers since 2001. Indeed, the Secretary of State for Defence indicated that there were circumstances in which he would be prepared to authorise the use of nuclear weapons by this country, ending the no first use policy. I hope that we will hear something clear to the effect that that is no longer the case and that we would not be prepared to use nuclear weapons under such circumstances. I also hope that, given all the insecurities that have existed in the world from September 2001 onwards—the wars in Afghanistan and in Iraq and all that has gone with them—we will ask ourselves the obvious question: what good are nuclear weapons in any of those circumstances? Do they not just threaten the destruction of this planet and eat up valuable resources that could be better used on something else, and should we not say that we intend to get rid of them? I hope that the British Government are prepared to take that step.

This subject has dominated the Labour party for a long time, and as we move towards the NPT conference and the possibility—I hope that it is only a possibility—of the development of a new generation of nuclear weapons, I suspect that it will become much more of a centre-stage political issue. It is up to this House to declare its views on the matter before the conference. I get the feeling that the majority of the public in this country have had enough of the losses brought about by the wars in which we have recently been involved, and have no stomach or wish for getting involved in preparation for the destruction of this planet, which is what nuclear weapons could bring about.

Many people have campaigned on the issue with great principle and verve for many years. Many have given up lives and careers to do so. Mordecai Vanunu is only one; many others, including Joseph Rotblat, have done a great deal. We should listen carefully to what they have to say, and use this opportunity to move in the direction of a more peaceful globe, not a world at war.

2.16 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn), who, as he says, has had a lifelong commitment to the cause of the abolition of nuclear weapons. I have had almost as long a commitment to the cause of nuclear deterrence and this country's retention of nuclear weapons. We have debated the subject many times. Although it was styled as a debate on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty review conference, when I saw that he was fortunate enough to have obtained this debate—on which I congratulate him—I knew that I could rely on him to go into the broader issues of whether Britain, in particular, should continue to possess nuclear weapons. I hope to follow his example of not out-speaking my allotted time, so I shall straight away address some of his points.

The hon. Gentleman asked us to think about Hiroshima and all the lives that were lost, but one point that is often overlooked is that Hiroshima was probably the first ever example in the atomic age of a nuclear-free zone. The western allies faced the question of what they were going to do to end the war; the bloody campaign was scheduled to continue, and a full-scale invasion of Japan would have cost many more lives than the bombing of Hiroshima did. When that was being considered, what would the allies have had to think about if the Japanese held atomic weapons of their own? I am not saying that I would have wanted the Japanese to hold atomic weapons, but the fact is that when one side has atomic or nuclear weapons, it completely alters the situation if its actual or potential adversary possesses them too.

The hon. Gentleman referred to wars such as that in Afghanistan, and others that are undoubtedly below the nuclear threshold. I can recall debating these matters with the CND 20 years ago, and in those days the argument was, "What on earth does Britain want nuclear weapons for? They didn't do us any good in the Falklands." My response now is what it was then: just because a given antidote to a particular deadly disease does not work against all sorts of other diseases, that is no good reason to throw it away. Nuclear weapons are not a deterrent to all forms of aggression, but the nuclear deterrent undoubtedly works against certain forms of aggression that exist when one country has weapons of mass destruction and another does not.

Let us consider the question of our treaty commitments under article 6 of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. That is often said by unilateral nuclear disarmers to commit us to a nuclear-free world and to the abolition of our nuclear weapons. Well, yes it does, but only in a way that encompasses such ideal goals as the abolition of all weapons worldwide, and of war in particular. If there were a practical policy to which we could all sign up, and if we could all march up to the lectern and raise our hands and vote one thing out of existence, I am sure that we would all agree that war was top of the list. We would love to vote conflict out of existence, we would love to vote nuclear war out of existence and we would love to vote conventional war out of existence. However, if we cannot do it all at once, we have to ask ourselves whether we are making the world a safer or a more dangerous place by voting one of those elements out of existence before the others. The case of those of us who have argued for 20 years or more in favour of the nuclear deterrent, is that in a world in which wars continue to happen, the abolition of nuclear weapons in the hands of the democracies and in those of worldwide society, would make the world a safer place for conventional warfare.

Let us return to the example of Hiroshima. Did the fact that nuclear weapons did not exist until 1945 make the world a safer place? Possibly, the 50 million people who were killed on both sides, including victims of the holocaust and other innocent civilians, would, if they but had a voice, disagree with the proposition. In reality, nuclear weapons can sometimes make the world more dangerous, and sometimes they can make it safer. Who would really argue now that in the situation that we faced for half a century—confrontation between the totalitarian Soviet bloc and the western democracies—the prescription of the CND should have been followed; the west and NATO should have abandoned the nuclear deterrent and left the Soviet Union with a monopoly of nuclear weapons? I remember the great debates about the deployment of Cruise and Pershing missiles, when it was said that we were five minutes from Armageddon, four minutes from Armageddon, a minute and a half from it or whatever time the nuclear clock was supposed to be ticking off; I remember all those apocalyptic statements. However, in the end what got rid of the nuclear weapons was multilateral negotiations, compounded by a change in the political system in the Soviet Union.

They say that all simple speeches should have a single main point, and I have come to the single main point of this one: that it is not the weapon systems per se that matter, it is the nature of the political systems of the countries that possess them.

Look what happened when we came to the end of the cold war. Did the Russians suddenly abolish all the nuclear weapons that we had been so fearful about for so many years? Of course they did not. But we suddenly stopped being anything like as fearful of them as we had been for such a long time. That was because Russia took great strides towards democracy. The only reason that subsequently—so long as Russia remains, as we hope that it will, on the democratic road—we are fearful of the Russian nuclear arsenal is the danger that those weapons could somehow leach out from Russian control into that of other societies and groups with no commitment to democratic principles. Then we would be concerned once again.

[Dr. Julian Lewis]

Therefore, the real answer to the question is not to ask, in some false egalitarian way, how we can lecture the dictatorships of the world that they should not have nuclear weapons when we keep our own. The answer is simple; I certainly do not have a problem with it. It is that they are dictatorships and we are a democracy. Nuclear weapons are good in the hands of democracies faced with dictatorships in the world; they are bad in the hands of dictatorships, as are other potential means of waging war. I have no difficulty at all in saying that Britain giving up nuclear weapons would not make a scrap of difference to whether a dictatorship continued to possess them. In those debates for so many years, I challenged again and again those who said that we should give up our nuclear weapons with the simple question: "Who are you saying would follow our example? Name a specific country." Nobody ever did.

Tony Lloyd: I am listening to the hon. Gentleman very carefully. Would he accept that, according to his logic—ignoring the issue of dictatorship and non-dictatorship because we are clear that North Korea is a dictatorship—it is highly unlikely that North Korea will invade the United States but it is not improbable that there could be circumstances in which the United States used military power against the North Koreans? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that his logic, alas, is that North Korea secures its future by developing a nuclear weapon? Would he advise the North Korean regime to pursue the nuclear option?

Dr. Lewis: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is falling into precisely the trap that, as I was saying, people who subscribe to his point of view continually fail to avoid. I do not need to advise North Korea. North Korea will do what it considers to be in its best interests. If it genuinely believes that it is at risk from being invaded by the United States, and if it has nuclear weapons, which apparently it has, nothing on earth—certainly no advice from the likes of me or, dare I say it, from him—will persuade it to abandon them.

I return briefly to what the non-proliferation treaty actually says. Article VI states:

"Each of the Parties to the Treaty undertakes to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date".

Most people would say that we have done that. I do not believe that most people would say that we, at any rate, are involved in a nuclear arms race, given the reductions that have been made. The article goes on to say

"and to nuclear disarmament, and on a Treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control."

The article therefore commits us to a disarmed world in the same breath as it commits us to a nuclear disarmed world. I long for the day when we have worldwide disarmament of every sort, because that will imply that there has been a revolution in the minds of man and that we no longer want to kill each other when we have the chance. Unfortunately, as we know from our own history and from present-day conflicts, the minds of man have not undergone that revolution. Until they do, people who do not want to be killed will have to defend themselves and deter attack.

Jeremy Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman is describing an appalling prospect for the human race. Does he believe, however, that some people learn to live in peace and harmony with each other, that not everyone around the world kills each other, and that most countries have survived perfectly well without nuclear weapons?

Dr. Lewis: Absolutely. I would even go so far as to say that most people subscribe to those views. Unfortunately, we have a perfect analogy in crime, particularly murder, in our own society. Most people in civilised societies do not approve of crime, and certainly do not approve of murder. However, the reality is that if enough people in domestic society are willing to commit murder, then domestic society must be able to prevent it, deter it, and if necessary, punish it. The same applies in international society.

In conclusion, Iran and Iraq were mentioned. It is too early to say what the final outcome will be of the war in Iraq, which I supported before, during and after it was carried out, but the signs are that for all the criticisms that were made of President Bush and for all the dire predictions of the impossibility of bringing any form of democracy to the middle east, the effect of those elections in Iraq is already beginning to resonate throughout the other countries of the middle east.

Progress of a sort has recently been made in the Lebanon, which I doubt we would have seen had it not been for recent events, particularly the successful elections, in Iraq. I believe that there is hope for the world of surviving the nuclear threat. That hope does not depend on making the mistakes that were made way back in the 1930s when people wrongly believed that aerial bombardment would destroy civilisation, and were therefore determined to limit the weapons and, in a sense, abolish the war. They limited the weapons, but they did not abolish the war. Instead, they brought it about. The way to limit the threat of nuclear weapons is to promote the spread of democracy. If democracy spreads, the nuclear problem will take care of itself.

2.30 pm

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh) (Lab): We all agree that we are discussing an important subject, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on initiating this debate. As he reminded us, the treaty on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons—the NPT—came into operation in 1970. The hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) also referred to the treaty, which originated during the cold war. Looking around, I see other colleagues who took part in similar debates during that period; some of us had most of our adult political lives during the cold war.

I wish to make a simple point, which is not intended to be a response to the previous speaker. At the time when the SS20s and the cruise missiles were being deployed, we were justified in being very worried that there might be a nuclear exchange. It might first occur at the theatre level, but most of us were convinced that, if such a nuclear exchange occurred in Europe, it could quickly escalate to a major all-out nuclear attack. Of course, that would have been Armageddon; the survivors really would have envied the dead. It is worth acknowledging that we are now free of that threat, which is a tremendous advance. Whatever the problems facing us—I shall refer to them shortly—the fact is that that threat and fear is behind us, because the cold war is over.

New problems have arisen since the end of the cold war. Recently, there was the 9/11 attack in the United States of America in 2001. As a result, there has been a huge focus on the need to counteract international terrorism. Our Government and other western Governments, including that of the US, have certainly taken such a focus. Furthermore, this week is the first anniversary of the Madrid train bombing. I shall not be drawn into some of the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for New Forest, East, but I point out that there is an issue in relation to the possibility of a terrorist organisation eventually getting its hands on weapons of mass destruction; in the long term, there must a risk of al-Qaeda or another such organisation getting hold of a dirty nuclear bomb. In that context, I simply wish to make reference to the proliferation security initiative, which is intended to interdict the movement of WMD-related materials. Importantly, the group of 11 states involved includes the United States, France and the United Kingdom.

I was quickly going to list some of the pluses and minuses of the period since the NPT came into operation, and particularly the '90s and beyond. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North covered some of them, and I shall not repeat what he said, but I was glad that he referred to the achievement of the African National Congress in South Africa; we should always acknowledge that that incoming Government made a tremendous decision.

It is not all gloom; we also have the strategic arms reduction treaties, START 1 and START 2. It is fair to say that START 2 has not yet fully delivered. Instead of START 3, we have the strategic offensive reduction treaty or SORT, on which I know that some Members might wish to comment, because in several respects it does not offer as much as we would have liked. The particular treaty I wish to highlight is the comprehensive test ban treaty or CTBT, which the United Nations General Assembly adopted in 1996 and which France, Russia and the UK have ratified. That is important, because the five official nuclear states must ratify it before it comes into operation. It has not yet come into operation because neither China nor the US has ratified it, but it is an important treaty, and I hope that it will come into force.

My hon. Friend referred to the minuses. There are lots of them; not least, they include the fact that the five official nuclear states—those that existed when the NPT was established—have been joined by what they officially call nuclear-capable states: Israel, India and Pakistan. In the context of Pakistan, there was the worrying revelation that A.Q. Khan, who was a senior scientist and manager of the Pakistani nuclear programme, was part of a network that was involved in selling nuclear weapon know-how and materials to other countries. It is a negative development when any new country develops nuclear weapons, and it is a positive development when any country gives up nuclear weapons, as South Africa did. I could touch on Iran and North Korea, as my hon. Friend did, but I will move on, because I know that some of my colleagues want to take part in the debate.

Given the run-up to the last two NPT conferences in 1995 and 2000, I think that there is a feeling in many countries, which is shared by many people, that the world has not delivered sufficiently and that nuclear weapon states in particular have not delivered enough. The treaty was a bargain struck in 1970 between nuclear weapon and non-nuclear weapon states that nuclear weapon states would be allowed to keep nuclear weapons on the basis that they would get rid of them and help non-nuclear weapon states to develop nuclear power peacefully.

As a reflection of many non-nuclear countries' frustration with the lack of progress, the new agenda coalition of eight states was set up in the 1990s. That was an important development, as the coalition is a positive force for nuclear disarmament. In 1999, at the General Assembly of the UN, it called on nuclear weapon states to "make an unequivocal undertaking to accomplish the speedy and total elimination of their nuclear arsenals and to engage without delay in an accelerated process of negotiations, thus achieving nuclear disarmament to which they are committed under article VI of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons".

That resolution was carried by 111 votes to 13, with 39 abstentions.

The new agenda coalition has called for the negotiation of a general convention banning all nuclear weapons, using the model of the 1983 chemical weapons convention. As hon. Members recognise, there is currently an implicit understanding that France, the UK and China will be let off the hook a bit until the US and Russia further reduce their arsenals. Much as we want those arsenals to be reduced, we may well have to consider other ways in which to get better responses from nuclear weapon states and to have more impact on the situation.

I look forward very much to hearing what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has to say. I have no doubts about his personal commitment to ensuring that the British Government do their best to achieve progress. Indeed, I think that we all recognise that the present Government have made some progress. The British permanent representative to the UN conference on disarmament, which is the main disarmament body and is based in Geneva, set out some the things done in the preparatory committee for the fourth conference last year. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will add to what he said, but I point out that the UK has provided working support for a fissile material cut-off treaty, which would be an important advance if we could achieve it.

We have a long way to go. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North has a long-standing, consistent interest in this matter, and there is a general consensus on the Government side, even if it does not extend to the other side of the House, that we need to give this matter high priority and that more needs to be achieved, not least at the conference. It is remarkable that the 1995 and 2000 conferences came out quite well in the end, although there was a lot of pessimism in the preceding years. The same might happen with the next conference; I certainly hope that it will be successful, but as important, if not more so, is what happens afterwards.

[Dr. Gavin Strang]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Before I call the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge), it might be for the convenience of the Chamber for me to indicate my intentions. If there is a Division in the main Chamber, I will suspend the sitting for 15 minutes.

2.40 pm

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing the debate, on his thought-provoking speech and on the work that he has done over many years in raising this highly important issue.

There is common agreement that the British Government are right to want to use their presidency of the G8 and the European Union to tackle two of the great world problems: climate change and global poverty. However, it could be said that proliferation is possibly an even more crucial issue facing us this year. The recent report of the UN high-level panel warned us that > "We are approaching a point at which the erosion of the non-proliferation regime could become irreversible and result in a cascade of proliferation."

It said that—despite the fact that, in some ways, one could say that until now the non-proliferation regime has been remarkably successful at limiting proliferation. Indeed, ironically, the invasion of Iraq showed that the nuclear non-proliferation treaty plus containment diplomacy were much more successful than most of us had expected. Iraq had probably abandoned its nuclear weapons programme and abolished its weapons of mass destruction by the mid-1990s.

Some apologists for that war claim that it has been successful in putting pressure on countries such as Libya. I find that a difficult argument to follow, because I think that Libya was already showing signs of constructive engagement since the negotiations on Lockerbie. It could at least as easily be argued that countries such as North Korea and Iran might see the risk of a US invasion as a reason for wanting to develop a nuclear deterrent.

Iran and North Korea reflect one of the weaknesses of the existing treaty. First, the treaty assumed that civil nuclear production and military nuclear production can be separated. In practice, there is an increasing possibility of dual use. The same centrifuges that are used to enrich material up to civil nuclear use might further be used to achieve the enrichment to weapons-grade material. That is so even when one is applying the additional protocol. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) said, Iran and Libya also illustrate the tremendous danger that was represented by the A.Q. Khan network and the possibility of nuclear weapons coming from a nuclear black market and their being used not only by states but by terrorists.

The second great weakness in the treaty is the situation of the de facto nuclear weapons states—India and Pakistan, and particularly Israel, because it is a catalyst to proliferation in the middle east.

In the eyes of many countries, the third great weakness has been the position of the nuclear weapons states. There has been a perceived lack of commitment on their part to pursuing nuclear disarmament and particular concern about the position of the Bush Administration. One must have considerable sympathy for the leaders of the new agenda coalition states when they said that the Bush Administration seem to be treating the treaty more as if it were an à la carte menu from which they could pick the bits that they liked than as a proper international treaty.

The review conference of 2000 was a considerable success, not least because Britain played a very constructive role in bringing together some of the nuclear weapons states and the non-nuclear weapons states. There was an action plan, which contained 13 steps. Various people are to blame, but I must say that the Bush Administration are particularly to blame for having virtually discarded that. They have abolished the anti-ballistic missile treaty and are refusing to make any progress towards the comprehensive test ban treaty. They share blame with China for the fact that the production of fissile materials ban has been stalled in arguments over the possibility of weapons in space. The Moscow treaty is widely perceived as not doing nearly enough to produce irreversible and verifiable reductions in nuclear weapons.

Then, of course, there is the worrying talk about producing new nuclear weapons systems, including ones that would make nuclear weapons more usable, thus breaking the nuclear taboo that has been common to all states for several decades. There is also talk of breaking the negative security assurances that we give to non-nuclear weapons states. That is also worrying, because it gives the impression that there is something arbitrary and capricious about the way in which the Administration regard not only bits of the treaty but the designating of states as to whether or not they are entitled to nuclear weapons. We need not an arbitrary but a fair system of international rule of law by treaty if we are to build a stable world.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend speaks eloquently and with a great deal of knowledge on the subject. He has come to the crux of the problem. Even the Government's strategic defence review of 2004 discussed ending nuclear weapons. They have said that if it is possible

> "to include British nuclear weapons in any negotiations, without endangering our security interests, we shall do so."

Part of the problem is that, despite the fine words said in 1995 and 2000—and possibly again in 2005—the crux is the enforcement and the signals sent out to countries in between those words. What does my hon. Friend propose we can do to ensure that many of the things that he has talked about are put into place on the ground between the conferences, rather than just having the fine words every five years?

Mr. Savidge: I will answer that later on. There are one or two proposals that I would like to touch on and I am conscious of the time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman said later on. The Member raising the debate ought to have an opportunity to hear a proper reply from the Minister. I have no power to impose time limits, but a couple of Members are trying to catch my eye before the winding-up speeches. Would the hon. Gentleman bear that in mind when he thinks about later on?

Mr. Savidge: I will try to do that.

Obviously, there have been some hopes that the Bush second term might prove to be slightly more conciliatory. I have to say that the announcement yesterday of the appointment of John Bolton, who could be described as one of the most virulent and outspoken opponents of arms control and the United Nations, as the US ambassador to the United Nations bodes very ill for the future of the treaty and of the planet.

The UK needs to play a constructive role, as we did in the previous review. Some states will obviously go to the conference purely to try to be disruptive by criticising the United States. The United States needs to be persuaded to be more flexible. We have to oppose absolutely any suggestion by the US that the agreements of 1995 and 2000 can be regarded as history. Allowing a new Administration of any state to ignore everything that that state has agreed in the past breaks down not only the NPT but the whole basis of international law. We must try to reinforce the NPT and the previous agreements of 1995 and 2000 and try to preserve as many of the 13 steps as possible.

Many positive proposals have been put forward by Dr. el-Baradei, as mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North, by some of the NGOs and by various of the states, such as the new agenda coalition. We will not make much progress on the CBTB, but we should at least try to get agreement to maintain a moratorium on testing. We should try to get the fissile material ban through and agree to Dr. el-Baradei's proposal to try to modify reactors to reduce the flow of production of weapons-grade material. We need to strengthen the additional protocol, bring in the de facto states and take firm action with states that withdraw from the NPT.

The nuclear weapons states must abandon the idea of new nuclear weapons programmes. We must make some proper progress towards nuclear disarmament by strengthening treaties such as the Moscow treaty or going well beyond them. Other countries should listen positively to what Britain has done in de-alerting nuclear weapons. It is absurd that so long after the end of the cold war we should have nuclear weapons on a hair-trigger. We need to develop the work that Britain is doing to improve verification, reduce the role of nuclear weapons in strategic thinking, strengthen the negative security assurances and the International Atomic Energy Agency, and try to extend nuclear-free zones, which now cover most of the Southern Hemisphere.

In 2000, Britain played a positive role in bringing the states together. I hope that in 2005—a far more difficult and dangerous time—we can also act as a bridge between the different states. The stakes could not be higher. If the NPT breaks down and there is proliferation and nuclear arms racing, we could face not only nuclear terrorism in future decades or centuries, but regional nuclear war or even major nuclear war, which, in a worst-case scenario, could endanger the very survival of the human species.

2.50 pm

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing this debate. The hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) took up the almost classical position, but—I hope that he will forgive me for saying this—the world has moved a little on since the days of the cold war.

Jeremy Corbyn: Not in New Forest, East.

Tony Lloyd: I am told that New Forest, East has not moved on since it was founded by William the Conqueror. That gives it its own charm, but does not bring it into the 21st century.

There are important reasons why we should debate the issue, not simply—and rightly—because of the run-up to the review conference this year. As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North pointed out, during the next Parliament this country will probably have to consider its future as a nuclear power. I do not think that my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us on this occasion what decisions are being prepared. However, it is important in considering such matters to recognise that the world is moving to higher levels of security, or insecurity. Currently, there is a strong thesis that suggests that the proliferators are in the ascendancy and that those who argue against proliferation are losing the battle.

It is worth restating the fact that one of the commitments of the nuclear states under the NPT was to de-escalate tensions, and seek more stability and security. Over the past few years Britain has played a part in that and, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) said, in some respects we have made real progress. However, it would be difficult to argue that the collective world of non-nuclear powers has been given the signal that the nuclear powers have been keen to move forward.

For example, one of the major drivers in the near future might be serious movements by the United States to adopt its strategic defence initiative. That programme could be a vehicle for vertical proliferation, by which I mean that it could encourage existing nuclear states to upgrade their nuclear stocks. I do not speak for or against China, but it is the obvious example. China's nuclear doctrine has always included the capacity to do serious damage to a number of north American cities in the event of nuclear attack by the United States. There are enough deterrents in place, but if the Chinese felt that they could no longer achieve that, the obvious answer would be to increase massively the number of decoy missiles and the number of active warheads available. The knock-on effect of that on China's neighbours, principally India, could be profound. India may choose to respond; and if it did, Pakistan would up the ante, and so on. Proliferation will take place among the nuclear states if we do not actively seek to de-escalate.

[Tony Lloyd]

We face real and different dangers nowadays—that is the flaw in the cold war logic. My hon. Friends referred to A.Q. Khan as driving proliferation. As we know, that proliferation has extended to other non-nuclear states, as has by now been well demonstrated. The problem is not just unfortunate: it is a serious flaw in the mutually assured destruction canon and means that there are now states that have been drawn, by their internal logic, into that proliferation agenda. We know, for example, that if Iran were to move along the road towards nuclear weapons, it would have a profound effect on its neighbours. Israel, as a nuclear weapons state in any case, might want to respond in some way—not, it is to be hoped, militarily, but in any case by increasing security.

However, those two drivers might have an impact on countries such as Turkey, with the prospect, perhaps, of a country such as Turkey or Saudi Arabia seeking nuclear weapons. The idea of a country with the political instability of the present Saudi Arabia becoming a nuclear weapons state is not the cheery matter that the hon. Member for New Forest, East would have us believe; it would be incredibly destabilising for the whole of the middle east. There is a real question about a Saudi Government in the future perhaps being replaced by what the hon. Gentleman himself described as non-democrats. Nuclear weapons would be catastrophic in those hands, and we should realise that.

The other big difference that is now apparent is proliferation not just to previously non-nuclear states but to non-state actors—terrorists. That is the real challenge for us all, because the most likely driver for that process is the Soviet legacy of nuclear stocks in Russia. In addition to that, there is capacity in the furtive world of nuclear proliferation for sideways leakage in a way that, from the point of view of a proliferating Government, may seem orderly—missiles in North Korea or, in the past, nuclear technology in Pakistan. It may leak into the hands of organisations such as al-Qaeda. That is a phenomenally dangerous prospect for the world, so there are strong and cogent reasons, in a situation as potentially unstable as the present, to re-examine our nuclear doctrines—our nuclear theologies, so to speak—and bring them forward into the 21st century. Britain can play a key role in that context and has done so at critical points in the past. The Government, with a genuine commitment to seeking more stable levels of security, may not be prepared to take the great leaps that were argued for in the past. Perhaps we are living in an era in which it would be sensible to take incremental steps forward. However, Britain could take the lead in arguing for those incremental steps, which could make the world considerably safer.

Part of what I am talking about might involve, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh mentioned, the fissile material cut-off treaty. It would be very significant if we could make progress with that. It would be very significant if the United States and China could make progress on the test ban treaty. A big flaw in the existing NPT structure, although it is very difficult to reorganise, is the role to be assigned to the nuclear states that are outside the treaty provision—India, Pakistan and Israel. It is far more sensible for them to be brought into the framework so that they can play a constructive rather than destructive role.

I hope that the Government will consider—it is vital in the context not just of Iran but of proliferation around the world—that it would not be ridiculous to give Iran some military guarantees against attack. Those need not be military guarantees for all circumstances, but guarantees against attack, and particularly nuclear attack. It would not be unreasonable to tell the Iranians that we recognise that, with two nuclear near-neighbours, the world could give some guarantees.

Whether the Iranians would believe the guarantees would always be a matter for negotiation, but there are practical steps that a well-disposed British Government, which I believe we have, could take part in to move us away from the current increasing insecurity of the planet, and towards increasing security. There will not, perhaps, be the great romance of the clashes of the days of the cold war, but instead a rather miserable future for parts of the world, if not the world, if we allow nuclear proliferators to proceed not just with proliferation of nuclear weapons but with their use. There could be a much better world if we moved the agenda towards greater stability.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind hon. Members that the Minister needs a decent chance to reply. There is half an hour, and there will be a Division shortly, but the time will be added on.

2.59 pm

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing the debate.

The exchanges during the opening contributions lifted the debate on to a philosophical plane, although the picture painted by the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) was rather depressing. I hope that his analysis is wrong. He might be in danger of drawing the wrong conclusions from the recent Iraq war and its effects on democracy in the middle east. I do not intend to get drawn into that issue, as I would be out of order; perhaps we shall debate it on another occasion.

The non-proliferation treaty is the cornerstone of efforts to rid the world of the dangers of nuclear weapons. In the 1990s, there was a great deal of confidence that substantial progress was being made in eliminating the threats of nuclear war, but the growth of international terrorism and the exposure of the international nuclear bazaar run by A.Q. Khan dented that optimism somewhat and shook any complacency out of the system.

The review conference comes at a crucial time; not only has the context of nuclear weapons discussions changed, but the activities of key states such as North Korea and Iran are giving us cause for concern. It would be inappropriate for us to ignore some of the important steps in nuclear disarmament that have been taken in recent years. The UK Government deserve continued recognition for the serious steps that have been taken: the withdrawal of the RAF's freefall nuclear weapon; the reduction to a single nuclear weapons delivery system in Trident; and a 70 per cent. overall reduction in the explosive power of the UK's military capabilities. The Government also signed up to the comprehensive test ban treaty in 1998, and they have undoubtedly played a significant and leading role in international diplomacy, not least in their work with France and Germany in relation to Iran.

Elsewhere, as others have said, South Africa renounced its illegal nuclear weapons programme, setting an important precedent a decade ago, and Libya's more recent disposal of its capability was a welcome step forward. Against those welcome developments, there are some real difficulties to consider. At the heart of the NPT is the tension between the five nuclear weapons states that wish to prevent proliferation in other states and, increasingly, non-state actors and the remaining 184 signatories that are willing to thole being outside the club on the understanding that real disarmament among the five will proceed.

Previous review conferences have experienced all the difficulties associated with that basic problem. In 2000, the conference eventually made some progress with the agreement to the so-called 13 steps. That highlighted, among other things, the need to bring the comprehensive test ban treaty into force, preserve the anti-ballistic missile treaty and adopt new verification procedures. The United States of America has rejected the first of those propositions and has withdrawn from the second, and we still await details of how the verification capabilities are to be enhanced. Meanwhile, states such as India, Pakistan and Israel continue to be weapons capable and are showing few signs of volunteering their systems for disarmament. North Korea taunts the world about its intentions, and Iran is engaged in a dangerous game of bluff.

Whatever historical perspective is taken on the possession and usefulness, or otherwise, of nuclear weapons, there can be no escape from the central deal at the heart of the NPT. The non-weapon states will allow the five nuclear states to possess their weapons on the basis of article VI, which demands the cessation of the arms race at an early date, and of a treaty on general and complete disarmament. Alongside that central issue are the security concerns, legitimate or otherwise, real or imagined, of those who possess or aspire to possess nuclear weapons; allusion has already been made to Iran. Equally, the nuclear weapon states themselves and others have a common interest in enhancing the verification procedures in order to ensure that non-state actors, as the jargon has them—international terrorists, as we might fear them—do not gain access to the technology and capability. The existence of A.Q. Khan's network suggests that we might be a bit off the pace, and real progress is needed on all sides at the conference to help us all catch up.

I hope that the Minister will tell us what he believes are the main features on the agenda at the conference. There is no doubt that we need to see some progress on the CTBT. We also need to see whether there is any prospect of a fissile material cut-off treaty. The welcome nuclear arms reductions of the early 1990s have been mentioned, and we need to ensure that they continue. We must also recognise that the anti-proliferation efforts of the United States and others will gain enhanced credibility if those countries are seen to participate in the whole nuclear disarmament process and not just in the bits that concern them most.

Dr. Lewis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Moore: If the hon. Gentleman would not mind, I would like to conclude my comments.

Alongside those issues, some serious institutional matters must be addressed; we see them day in, day out in the international press. The most important point, however, is surely that the political will exists to ensure that the work of the International Atomic Energy Agency and others is not undermined.

I have always believed in multilateral nuclear disarmament and I retain that view very strongly. My concern is growing, however, that the process is stalled. Without further progress on disarmament, we shall not only fail to achieve the ultimate objective of a nuclear-free world, but increase the risks of proliferation and fail to equip ourselves to verify the state of nuclear capabilities throughout the world. As a nuclear weapons state, this country bears a particular responsibility and must take a lead at the conference in re-establishing some momentum in the disarmament process. The stakes have rarely been higher.

3.7 pm

Mr. Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): I fear that my remarks will be interrupted by the Division bell, but before they are, let me join others in congratulating the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing the debate. He has been a doughty, consistent and passionate advocate of unilateral nuclear disarmament, although I, like my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), would be just as passionate in disagreeing with his perspective. None the less, he has maintained a level of consistency of which he should be proud.

Given the Government's commitment to non-proliferation and the current active negotiations with Iran, which the Foreign Secretary is taking up with his German and French counterparts, the UK's participation in the review conference should be significant. The review is a real opportunity to test parties' commitment to the three pillars of the NPT—non-proliferation, disarmament and the peaceful use of nuclear energy.

The geopolitical climate has changed immeasurably since the last review in 2000. We have seen the horrific events of 11 September in New York and the rise of international terrorism. We have seen the case for war in Iraq based on inaccurate intelligence about weapons of mass destruction. North Korea has withdrawn from the NPT and recently withdrawn from multilateral talks, subsequently claiming that it already has nuclear weapons. Iran appears to be misleading the IAEA and the international community over its apparently peaceful nuclear programme. Such events have underlined the importance of the non-proliferation treaty and of the IAEA continuing to work towards preventing nuclear proliferation and reducing nuclear arms throughout the world.

[Mr. Mark Simmonds]

Unlike several hon. Members in the Chamber, Conservative Members are not anti-nuclear, and I recognise the many benefits that nuclear technology has given the world because of its ability to create large amounts of relatively clean energy. Like my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East, I recognise that nuclear weapons played an important strategic role during the cold war years. The mutual threat between the two relatively rational adversaries ensured that nuclear weapons were never used. The non-proliferation treaty has subsequently played an important role in gradually downsizing our nuclear arsenals and preventing other countries from building new weapons through the strategic arms reduction treaties and, more recently, the strategic offensive reductions treaty. Indeed, that fact was recognised by the hon. Member for Islington, North and the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang).

The hon. Member for Islington, North was right to say that countries without nuclear weapons have been concerned for some time that nuclear powers are not progressing under article VI to reduce nuclear arsenals, and that there is a resistance to disarmament, despite disarmament being a stated objective of the treaty. I am sure that some hon. Members in the Chamber today would argue that that is not so. Indeed, the United States, the Soviet Union and more recently Russia have worked very hard through various treaties to reduce their nuclear warheads to secure a satisfactory resolution of at least part of article VI of the original treaty.

We accept that, in a utopia, the globe would be free of nuclear weapons, but proliferation must be controlled, and reductions through bilateral treaties between the United States and Russia must continue before the UK commences disarmament discussions. That must happen only when the Government of whichever political party are convinced that our national security will not be undermined.

Unfortunately, the debate must take place against a threat posed by nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction that may be greater now than it has been for some considerable time. I was intrigued by the comments made by the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd), who seemed to be arguing that the world is now a safer place than it was during the cold war.

Tony Lloyd indicated dissent.

Mr. Simmonds: He is shaking his head, which I am pleased to see.

The danger came with the break-up of the Soviet Union and the transfer of nuclear technology and fissile materials. Rogue states and non-state actors—terrorists—can now obtain nuclear technology and fissile materials with the intention of holding the world to ransom.

Sadly, rogue states and non-state parties are not the only ones who pose a problem. Unfortunately, as has already been mentioned, India, Pakistan and Israel refuse to join the NPT, which has led to many difficulties in enforcing the regime. Israel's status as the only nuclear power in the middle east prevents that most dangerous area of the world from becoming a nuclear-free zone. Thankfully, the India-Pakistan situation appears to have stabilised in recent years, but there is always the possibility of a crisis developing. I want all three states to be encouraged to join the NPT to help them to join the international community in this area.

Furthermore, the activities of the Pakistani scientist Qadir Khan show that Pakistan's refusal to comply with the wider implications of the treaty has created a significant problem, which became clear when Libya's decision to dismantle the nuclear programme revealed a clandestine market in nuclear material. Although some states have refused to sign the NPT altogether, other states—Iran and North Korea are the two most obvious ones—used it as a cover for the development of nuclear weapons.

Although all signatories of the NPT are entitled to use nuclear fuel for peaceful purposes, Iran's huge wealth of natural resources makes its large-scale nuclear programme cause for concern. Despite what the hon. Member for Islington, North says, Iran has continued to mislead the IAEA over its acquisition of centrifuge technology and enrichment, which, with modern-day technology, is not necessary for the pursuance of domestic nuclear capabilities. It also refused to allow nuclear inspectors to visit parts of a key military complex at Parchin only 10 days ago.

North Korea is another country that has flouted the NPT—indeed, it has withdrawn from it—since the previous review meeting. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge) argued that the North Koreans have acquired a nuclear capability because of the threat of an invasion by the United States. I argue that that is not the case, evidenced by the fact that, again following Libya's welcome disarmament, it was clear that North Korea sold uranium hexafluoride to Libya for the enrichment of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Savidge: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way in a very interesting speech. I did not suggest for a minute that that was North Korea's sole purpose for acquiring a nuclear capability; I said that that might be an influence on such states.

Mr. Simmonds: I am grateful for that clarification.

There are two main problems with North Korea. First, it is creating regional instability. The Minister will know of the domestic debate in Japan that questions whether is it right that Japan should be the only major power without nuclear weapons when North Korea has gone nuclear and South Korea wants to go nuclear. That political situation in Japan is causing great consternation. Secondly, rogue states with nuclear weapons and fissile material may provide nuclear weapons on the black market to non-state actors who could create dirty bombs and mayhem in many towns and cities throughout the world.

Clearly, some distinct factors need to be resolved at the review conference, which is to take place in May. The NPT needs to be strengthened to prevent the spread of technology and knowledge. Steps must be taken to secure military and civilian nuclear materials and technology in every country, including Britain, in order to avoid materials going missing. That is particularly appropriate for the ex-Soviet states.

A number of key areas need to be discussed and decisions must be taken. There is the issue of the comprehensive test ban treaty; can the Minister update us on his view of the position of the United States and China? There is the ban on the production of fissile material. Does that relate just to existing stockpiles, or only to future production? That subject was mentioned by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North. Countries that withdraw from the NPT should immediately be referred to the United Nations Security Council.

Nuclear suppliers should consider limiting the supply of enrichment and reprocessing plants to those states that already possess them. We should discuss creating a special committee of the International Atomic Energy Agency board of governors that would focus intensively on safeguards to ensure that nations comply with their international obligations. We should consider allowing only those states that have signed the additional protocols to import civilian nuclear programmes.

We should discuss raising inspection programmes for additional protocols. Many states have signed up to the additional protocols, but have not yet ratified them. That includes significant players, such as Russia, Iran, Uganda, Niger and Mexico. It is clear that the technology for proliferating resistant nuclear energy systems exists. Enrichment and reprocessing are not necessary for nations seeking to harness nuclear energy for peaceful means. That technology must be shared and facilitated, and there must be verification to ensure that those who are genuinely trying to benefit from nuclear energy and to facilitate the provision of it for peaceful purposes do not transfer technology across for military means. There should also be discussion of the adoption of an additional protocol to ensure that states and parties are unable to divert fissile material to secret weapons programmes.

The 2005 conference needs to succeed. In an ever-more dangerous world, members of the responsible international community need to stand together—both those with nuclear weapons and those without. It was not anticipated that the previous review, in 2000, would be a success, but I give credit to the Government: through hard work and a willingness to take a strategic view and to compromise, they played a major role in ensuring that it was a success. Whatever political party is in government in May when the review takes place, Britain needs to play a full and constructive role in the meeting.

3.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): I welcome the debate, and thank my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) for initiating it. As others have said, he has a long and distinguished record of interest in this most important issue. We have seen a number of familiar faces today, and heard a number of familiar arguments, but they are no less interesting for having been heard before. As my hon. Friend said, these arguments are fundamental to the future of the human race, and it is right that we are debating this subject.

I believe that we have a good story to tell, as I think hon. Members on both sides have acknowledged. I shall try to set out a bit of it in a moment, but my hon. Friend asked one or two questions, so I shall try to deal quickly with those first. He asked about our policy towards Iran. It is well known that our policy is to continue engagement, along with two European Union Foreign Minister colleagues. In fairness, President Bush has said that he supports this approach.

3.19 pm

Sitting suspended for Divisions in the House.

3.48 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Mullin: My hon. Friend asked about our plans for replacing Trident. As I am sure he knows, no decision has yet been taken, but we are keeping our options open. A decision will need to be taken during the next Parliament. He asked what is going on at Aldermaston and whether it is consistent with the NPT. My advice is that what is happening is consistent with the treaty and that the modernisation of facilities at Aldermaston and the decommissioning of those no longer required, of which we have made no secret, is an ongoing programme of work to meet safety, regulatory and operational requirements. Were there to be significant developments, we would, of course, inform Parliament.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds) asked about the comprehensive test ban treaty and the position of the United States and China. I do not speak for the Governments of the US or China, but I am not aware of any change in their position. We believe that they should both ratify.

The nuclear non-proliferation treaty is the cornerstone of the non-proliferation regime. We remain fully committed to the treaty and we participate actively in the review process. The treaty is strong; it has the widest membership of any arms control treaty and retains the wholehearted support of the United Kingdom and the majority of the international community. We want universal membership, although that may not be achievable in the current circumstances. We are also committed to strengthening the treaty to face new challenges.

Several hon. Members have asked what we want out of the review conference that will take place soon. The UK's main goal will be to emphasise the need for greater efforts in the non-proliferation and compliance parts of the treaty. Recent events have shown that a number of states continue to seek clandestine nuclear weapons programmes and also that individuals are willing to assist them in the proliferation of sensitive materials and technology. The treaty must therefore be strengthened and the political will generated to prevent such action.

The treaty remains at the core of our nuclear counter-proliferation policy. It has proved successful in limiting the number of countries deciding to develop nuclear weapons. It provides the essential underpinning to maintain international cohesion when addressing the challenges posed by Iran and North Korea, as it did recently in respect of Libya's nuclear programmes. It also serves to strengthen the controls on the transfer of sensitive technology, without which progress in the International Atomic Energy Agency and other forums would become more difficult.

[Mr. Mullin]

During the review conference, we will outline the considerable progress that we had made on nuclear disarmament. It says in my briefing document that that was not often acknowledged, but the main Opposition party, the Liberal Democrats, and Labour Members have acknowledged today that the UK's record on disarmament is good. The United Kingdom has made considerable progress on the 13 practical steps towards nuclear disarmament that were agreed at the previous review conference five years ago. For example, we are working on a programme to develop UK expertise in verifying the reduction and elimination of nuclear weapons internationally. It is a three-part exercise, which sets out the methodologies for the verification of nuclear disarmament.

We will focus at the review conference on monitoring the nuclear warhead complex. We shall also summarise the range of technologies and approaches that have been researched during the five-year programme. The work will provide the basis for methodologies that could be used in a verification regime for a future disarmament treaty. We will publish a consolidated paper on that work at the conference. The United Kingdom remains fully committed to all aspects of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, including global and verifiable nuclear disarmament. We have a good record of fulfilling our NPT obligations on nuclear disarmament. The hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) spelt out some of the measures that we have taken, but I shall describe them in slightly more detail.

We have withdrawn and dismantled the RAF's freefall bomb, so Trident is now our only nuclear weapons system. We dismantled the last Chevaline warhead in 2002. We have reduced our operationally available stockpile to fewer than 200 warheads, which is a reduction of more than 70 per cent. in the potential explosive power of our nuclear forces since the end of the cold war. We have reduced the readiness of our nuclear forces: only one Trident submarine is now on deterrent patrol; it carries 48 warheads. The submarine on patrol is usually on several days' notice to fire and its missiles are detargeted.

We have signed and ratified the comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty and continue to promote its early entry into force. We have placed fissile material no longer required for defence purposes under international safeguards. All enrichment and reprocessing facilities in the United Kingdom are now liable to international inspection. We have continued to press for negotiations on a fissile material cut-off treaty. Indeed, we announced in 1995 that we had stopped the production of fissile material for nuclear weapons and other nuclear explosive devices.

We have been more transparent about our stockpiles of nuclear and fissile materials, and have begun a national historical accounting study for fissile material produced. We have signed and ratified the relevant protocols of both the treaty of Rarotonga, which is the south Pacific nuclear weapons-free zone, and the treaty of Pelindaba, the African nuclear weapon-free zone. We are also engaged in negotiations on nuclear weapon-free zones in central Asia and south-east Asia.

The Government's policy on nuclear weapons remains as set out in the 1998 strategic defence review and the 2003 defence White Paper. We are committed to working towards a safer world in which there is no requirement for nuclear weapons. We continue to play a full role in international efforts to strengthen arms control and prevent proliferation of chemical, biological and nuclear weapons. However, the continuing risk from the proliferation of nuclear weapons and the certainty that a number of other countries will retain substantial nuclear arsenals means that our minimum nuclear deterrent capability, currently represented by Trident, is likely to remain a necessary element of our security for the foreseeable future. We continue to support multilateral negotiations towards mutual balanced and verifiable reductions in nuclear weapons worldwide. When we are satisfied that sufficient progress has been made to allow us to include British nuclear weapons in any negotiations without endangering our security interests, we shall do so.

It has been suggested that the non-signatory status of India, Pakistan and Israel fundamentally undermines the non-proliferation treaty. Those countries are not subject to all international non-proliferation norms. As has already been suggested, such a lack of control might, in the case of Pakistan, have contributed to the serious case of proliferation of nuclear technology through the A. Q. Khan network.

The UK continues to call on all non-signatory states to become signatories to the NPT, as non-nuclear weapon states. We are additionally pressing them to sign up to other agreements that control nuclear proliferation. We want them to join early negotiations on a fissile material cut-off treaty; we would like India and Pakistan to become party to the comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty, and Israel to ratify its accession to that treaty. We have been encouraging negotiations on a weapons of mass destruction-free zone in the middle east and look forward to the proposed conference on the issue in the near future.

We live in an uncertain world. The non-proliferation treaty faces challenges from states such as Iran and North Korea. We believe that the global community needs to strengthen the treaty by ensuring full compliance by such states. For our part, the UK is continuing to work in collaboration with the international community to ensure that Iran operates within its obligations under the treaty. We have also worked with the United States to secure Libya's agreement to renounce its clandestine nuclear weapons programme. Both of those efforts demonstrate our clear commitment to strengthening the non-proliferation regime. As part of the work, we also want to see a strengthened International Atomic Energy Agency. We are committed to spending up to £400 million over 10 years through the global partnership to help tackle the weapons legacy of the former Soviet Union. It is also intended that the work should be expanded to cover states such as Libya and Iraq.

I hope that those efforts, and others that time does not permit me to enumerate, demonstrate our commitment to building a secure and peaceful world, free from nuclear weapons. We are working towards creating a future in which the UK is secure enough to be able to disarm completely.

Jeremy Corbyn: In the advice that the Minister has been given, what is the legal position of Britain in developing a new generation of nuclear weapons within the terms of the NPT of 1970?

Mr. Mullin: My advice is that it is permitted. However, I shall write to my hon. Friend with the details.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I ask all hon. Members who do not wish to stay for the next debate to leave quickly and quietly?

Port Sunlight

3.59 pm

Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): I am delighted to have secured this debate on planning applications at Port Sunlight village. It presents an opportunity for me both to highlight the importance of the village to our heritage and to represent the concerns of residents, which I substantially share. This self-contained residential area is hugely significant, not only to the region, not even solely to the country as a whole but internationally, as I hope that a short history will help to illustrate.

Port Sunlight was born of a most laudable combination of human qualities, which is often found in the throes of the industrial revolution—the entrepreneurial spirit and philanthropy. English Heritage has said that Port Sunlight is arguably the finest remaining example of the so-called workers' village and a forerunner to the garden city movement. In common with Bourneville, the home of the Cadbury brothers' chocolate factory, and Saltaire, established by the wool baron Sit Titus Salt, Port Sunlight was founded in order to provide self-contained, clean, modern and sanitary accommodation for workers employed at the adjacent factory. William Hesketh Lever, born in 1851, expanded his father's already prosperous enterprise, before beginning to specialise in the marketing of soap in 1884. Business boomed and, to cater for demand, construction of new premises began in 1888. In the following two years, land was purchased to allow for 28 houses to be built.

The architect of the initial round of construction was William Owen but, subsequently, a plethora of people lent themselves to design homes, which has resulted in the creation of the unique mix that we enjoy at Port Sunlight today. Uniquely, and in contrast to Bourneville, Lever and Owen married the philanthropic endeavour of improvement of the working class with the visual tradition of the sylvan suburb. By the turn of the century there were 400 houses, and the village continued to expand; today, there are nearly 1,000 dwellings. Port Sunlight possesses a character which it has preserved well; my constituency, the community and the country are richer for it.

A rich tapestry of features contribute to making Port Sunlight what it is. The Lady Lever art gallery contains one of the most beautiful collections of fine and decorative arts in the country, and the recently refurbished Gladstone theatre is a gem. They are but two such institutions, and they are not merely minor curiosities—they are part of our cultural heritage. The importance of Port Sunlight was recently recognised, when a project of £1 million, to construct a heritage centre befitting its status, received funding partly from the Heritage Lottery Fund and partly from the European Union objective 1 programme for Merseyside.

Port Sunlight is also a living place, with a pub, a school, a church, a bowling green, and, until recently, a post office—the Post Office, with a shortage of sensitivity, recently announced its closure. In addition, there have been places of work in the village—a garden centre, offices, and a gardeners' compound. The village also has its own railway station. It needs to be a living and working place, not a "Disneyfied" dormitory.

[Mr. Ben Chapman]

However, there is a problem. After Unilever—as the company became—set up a new company to manage the village at arm's length in the 1960s, a process began that eventually led to housing being sold, either to residents whose tenancies had expired, or on the open market. In 1999, management of the village passed to an independent charitable organisation established for the purpose, the Port Sunlight village trust. Its declared responsibilities include to preserve

"and maintain the Port Sunlight Conservation Area ... in Merseyside for the benefit of the nation at large, the present character and amenities of that area and whatever of the historical, architectural and constructional heritage may exist in the Port Sunlight Conservation Area aforesaid whether in the form of buildings ... open spaces or otherwise which are of particular beauty or historical, architectural or constructional interest."

I regret that the proposals made jointly by the trust and Miller Homes, which I will outline shortly, threatened those terms of reference and the character of the village. The trust appears by omission tacitly to admit that the plans do not fit with the mission statement I have quoted, by referring to it as setting out what

"the trust may do and does not in any way determine what the Trust must do."

It is not the fact of the proposed developments per se that cause me and many of my constituents concern, although by their nature plans for development in conservation areas with listed status such as Port Sunlight should be treated with the utmost caution. Any development, no matter how it fits in with existing designs, can alter a village—in this case a village of 1,000 dwellings already—if it is of sufficient scale.

New homes have been constructed in the past decade or so, but have not presented a particular problem. However, they were designed in the traditional arts and craft style and blend in with the village as it stands. Rather, it is the background to the trust's insistence on recent proposals that requires close attention, for the justification is claimed, substantially, to be financial.

The village trust says that the planning permission that it seeks is essential to its needs if it is to comply with the covenant established with the trust's inception. The trust says that, for various reasons, it needs to develop and raise money by selling new properties for capital and by building properties to rent. Accordingly, the trust and Miller Homes submitted six applications, which could have provided 296 new dwellings, apparently on the questionable basis that if enough applications were submitted for enough dwellings, at least some would get through. By themselves, 296 dwellings would change Port Sunlight village, whatever their design.

From that swathe of applications made to the Wirral borough council planning department, for dwellings of varying design and location, two were accepted on 11 January 2005. Just for the record, they are for 21 apartments on Water street and 62 apartments on Wharf street. The two approved applications may involve the least offensive of the designs proposed and at least one is in the arts and crafts style, but the development of 62 apartments raises the greatest concern, because those apartments represent a deviation from the character of the village.

The trust's financial predicament, which is claimed to be the cause of the development, has two elements. First, prior to the establishment of the trust a financial audit was undertaken with a view to making the trust self-sufficient in building and public space upkeep, with the aid of an annual income provided by Unilever as part of a £25 million settlement with which the trust was established. Even now, Unilever does not accept that that dowry was insufficient for the purpose. Moreover, it was for the trustees who first joined the trust to establish that it was adequate—including, in my view, by showing due diligence in relation to it. In the light of further studies conducted after the trust's inception—and, effectively, by the trust itself—that sum was claimed to be insufficient to cover the costs of maintaining and refurbishing the complex.

Secondly, the trust's finances were hit by losses suffered as a result of the stock market downturn in 2000. That the stock market has declined is beyond question, but it seems to me that what goes down must eventually come up. In any event, although consistently prayed in aid of what is proposed, finances should not be a material issue in such planning matters. Before any account is taken of the finances, I would need to be satisfied that the trustees had done all that they could through, for example, benchmarking with other model villages and learning from them, responsible tourism, exploiting the grants regime and so on. After all, Merseyside is an objective 1 area.

Many other aspects of the consideration of the applications were questionable, not least the consultation with residents. The problem is that, although only two applications were approved, they were particularly open to debate. For the residents, it appeared that the council may have been acting against its own planning guidance, which states that local planning authorities should reject poor design where decisions are supported by clear planning policies, and that "special regard should be had for such matters as scale, height, form, massing", in respect of

"the traditional pattern/frontages ... and detailed design."

Furthermore, it was felt that the consultation with the residents was somewhat unsatisfactory and not in the spirit of the code of conduct. Some of the residents' objections, for example, were not included in reports submitted for consideration by the planning committee.

The Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment has lodged objections to the designs themselves. Although the guidelines were not ignored, I cannot say without compunction that the designs are in keeping with the character of the village. Some of the proposed apartments would be three storeys high, but adjacent to two-storey existing buildings. The materials to be used would not be wholly sympathetic to the surrounding buildings. Moreover, there would be a high density of apartments, which would be at odds with William Lever's leafy suburban vision. The problem seems to be that the designs are confused; they are neither one thing nor the other.

As part of the planning committee's consultation, CABE submitted the following comment:

"The footprint of the ... proposal for Wharf street that has been implemented is extremely large and is completely out of character with the other buildings in Port Sunlight ... CABE do not think any"—

I emphasise the word "any"— "of the schemes are of a high enough quality to receive planning permission."

However, two did.

When the applications were approved, the trust expressed its disappointment that the remainder were rejected. It said:

"We will have to go away and come up with some other plans about how we take things forward—whether that be appealing some of the decisions that haven't gone in our favour or coming up with alternative developments".

The chairman of the planning committee said:

"The concept of conservation means to some that nothing ever changes. Others say that if anything does happen it must take on the spirit and flavour of the original architecture and form of an area. I hold the second opinion. I believe that so long as things are handled properly change and improvement can be achieved."

I do not dissent from that, but the problem is that one wholly inappropriate design was recommended by the planners for approval. The very body entrusted with the protection of the village is now casting itself as a developer. Is the village properly protected in such circumstances?

As I said, the final word may not have been spoken. Decisions were taken on 11 January, but more will be sought. It is commonplace for developers who have had applications turned down to appeal, unlike protestors against proposals, who get no appeal. Developers can appeal ad infinitum, but I hope that they will be more responsible and that there will be pause for thought.

Before any further steps are taken or any proposals are made, I ask that certain items are considered. First, full account should be taken of those for whom the development will form part of the fabric of their lives. I pay tribute to the Port Sunlight Conservation and Residents Society and its campaign group Save Port Sunlight, which have attempted to limit inappropriate development. Those involved have organised, deliberated, written letters and collected 2,200 signatures for a petition. None of those efforts should be underestimated, but it saddens me that they became necessary.

I am afraid that there seems to have been a lack of constructive dialogue between the residents on the one hand and the trust and Miller Homes on the other. I hope that that will be put right, because dialogue is essential. It should not be merely cosmetic, because, in the long run, no one will benefit, and there will only be losers. The refusal by the trust and, to some extent, Miller Homes to engage seriously undermined the consultation process. What consultation there was with residents consisted of a four-hour presentation in a pub. Now, four hours is a long time, but the residents felt that they were being talked at, not listened to. The trust and Miller Homes were either unable or unwilling to answer many of the questions put to them. If residents had approached the issue with the mind of a saboteur, I could understand the trust's reticence, but that was not the case.

The second point that I would like the Minister to consider is that there needs to be a master plan before any planning decisions are taken. As part of Liverpool's capital of culture year in 2008, Port Sunlight is, rightly, being promoted as a major attraction. Visitors will come from all over the United Kingdom and around the world. They will all congregate on Merseyside, and many will come to Port Sunlight. With the capital of culture year, we on Merseyside have only one crack of the whip. The trust has cited long overdue maintenance and repairs that need to be carried out in advance of that as its overriding concern. Thus, there is a motivating factor for the cash-raising developments. It is right in so far as it recognises that work is needed and overdue. However, it is my belief and that of residents and other interested parties that not enough has been done to exploit other potential sources of funding.

There should have been a greater focus—admittedly limited by inadequate heritage centre facilities—on attracting tourists and exploiting the tourist stay. The new visitor centre will help in that enterprise, but there are other initiatives to be taken. Some buildings may have lain idle for want of a realistic rental price being sought.

Thirdly, a proposal for a conference on the future of Port Sunlight, put forward by English Heritage, is coming to fruition. It will bring together representatives from model villages across the UK in order to provide a forum for the exchange of ideas, as well as for the development of best practice in respect of long-term management. That is well overdue and much to be praised.

In addition, English Heritage has offered to provide advice and, possibly, financial assistance to help the trust come up with a sustainable vision for long-term upkeep of the village. That is to be welcomed. I am delighted to have been asked to chair the conference, which will take place at Port Sunlight—hopefully, in the autumn.

Fourthly, English Heritage will be producing an authoritative book on Port Sunlight in its Informed Conservation series and I hope that that will act as a reference point for any future steps that might be taken in the village.

Fifthly, we need to take account of the potential for world heritage site status. If Saltaire and New Lanark can qualify, some would say, surely Port Sunlight could qualify—perhaps even more so. Lord McIntosh of Haringey, the Minister for Media and Heritage, has told me that the earliest that it could be included on a tentative list for nominations is 2006. We therefore have an opportunity to help Port Sunlight to get the best possible chance of being judged a site of "outstanding universal value", which I think it is, as is required by the criteria for eligibility. I hope that when we move forward with that, we can get more support than we have had in the past from Wirral metropolitan borough council.

Sixthly, and finally—you will be glad to learn, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I urge Unilever to use its good offices to ensure that any future development that is necessary at Port Sunlight is responsible. Not only does Unilever still have a vibrant factory as part of the Port Sunlight site—as a consequence, it objected to the proposals that were put before the planning committee—but that vast international company has, after all, Port Sunlight as its birthplace. It is a key—possibly the key—element of the Lever heritage. Unilever has a vested interest in the success of the village and I hope that it will do all that it can to stress that.

[Mr. Ben Chapman]

Let us hope that on the basis that I have outlined, all the parties concerned will reflect long and hard before making any further proposals for development at Port Sunlight.

4.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) on securing this debate. He raises an issue that is clearly important to a good number of local residents and, indeed, more widely.

Until this debate I was not particularly aware of Port Sunlight or its story and fascinating history. As my hon. Friend so eloquently explained, it is an important part of the legacy of efforts made by a number of philanthropic Victorian factory owners to secure decent homes for their workers. Thankfully, we now have our own decent homes strategy to redress that problem in the 21st century, but historically Port Sunlight ranks very much alongside the examples that he quoted of Saltaire and Bournville.

Port Sunlight village follows from the Levers' decision in the 1880s to move to new premises. That provided the opportunity for a fresh start, in the form of not only a new, modern soap factory—by the standards of the day—but nearby decent housing for workers, with schools, a library and other public buildings to encourage tenants towards self-improvement. That was, perhaps, an early example of sustainable community development.

The first houses were built in the late 1880s and the building continued up to the start of the second world war. Different phases of building are distinguishable by the materials used, and they are all laid out in a landscape garden setting. I understand that no two blocks of houses in the village are identical. Particularly noteworthy is the fact that from the very beginning, in the late 19th century, every home was provided with a bathroom. That is quite exceptional. Because I was not familiar with the site I found some photos on the internet, so that I could visualise what my hon. Friend has been describing.

Modernisation and renovation work over the years has brought the village up to date, but without affecting its essential character and appearance adversely. I think that that has been acknowledged locally by the council in the designation of the village as a conservation area, and, nationally, by the fact that so many buildings—900 of them—have been included in the statutory list of buildings of architectural or historical importance. I very much agree with my hon. Friend that Port Sunlight village is a nationally—indeed, internationally—important place. It enjoys an international reputation and attracts a great number of visitors.

My hon. Friend has suggested, here and elsewhere, that the village might be a candidate for world heritage site status, under the terms of the UNESCO convention. I think that my hon. Friend will know, because he has been in touch with her about it, that that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. To qualify for world heritage status a site must be of outstanding universal value judged against the criteria set out in UNESCO's operational guidelines. However, I might add that following a consultation exercise in 1998 and further discussions the Government drew up a list of 25 potential sites.

After a rule change by UNESCO, which took effect in 2002, the UK is allowed to submit only one nomination per year for what is described as a cultural site for world heritage status. Some 17 sites remain of that initial tentative list of potential and future nominations. I think, therefore, that my hon. Friend can see that there will be a substantial number of sites for the Government to put forward in future years. That said, the Government expect to review the list in the next couple of years, and that will provide an opportunity to make the case for Port Sunlight. No final decisions have been taken about the form that the bidding process might take, or the precise timing.

The criteria are very demanding, so a strong case would need to be mounted to persuade the Secretary of State to put Port Sunlight on the list of potential UK sites. I shall of course communicate this debate to my right hon. Friend so that she is aware of the bid that may be on its way.

Since 1999 the responsibility for the management of the landscape and environment of the village, in particular, and of the heritage centre there, has rested with a charitable trust, the Port Sunlight village trust. For reasons that I think my hon. Friend has explained, the trust was not adequately funded for the work that it took on, and it now needs to generate additional future income and capital to fund a backlog of work and help to secure the future management and maintenance of the village. That is a debate that my hon. Friend has raised; the question is how to go about the task.

My hon. Friend suggested that the trust might not fully have explored the availability of grant aid to support its aims and that it might do more to generate income through tourism development. I can only suggest that he and his colleagues continue to exhort the trust to pursue those possibilities with the borough council and other agencies.

Of course, the main issue that concerns my hon. Friend, about which he has spoken, is the proposal by the trust to generate capital receipts by releasing land in the village for housing development. To that end, the trust, with, in some cases, the developer, Miller Homes, submitted a batch of six planning applications for a housing development on sites that overlap or lie adjacent to one another at the edge of the village, quite close to the factory buildings and straddling the boundary of the conservation area.

The planning applications have been determined by Wirral metropolitan borough council. In January it granted permission for two of the applications and refused permission for three. Those three are now the subject of appeals to the Deputy Prime Minister, together with the sixth, on which the applicants have appealed because of the council's failure to determine it in the prescribed period. Arrangements have been made for a public inquiry to be held into the appeals, and that is scheduled to open on 20 June.

My hon. Friend will appreciate that, in the circumstances, it would not be right for me to say anything today about the merits or otherwise of the developments proposed, because that might be seen as prejudicing the outcome of the appeals. Nor do I think it right to comment on the decision of the council to grant permission for the proposed apartments on Wharf street that so concern my hon. Friend and his constituents. Those were decisions for the council to take, and in doing so I am sure that it paid particular regard to the comments of CABE and English Heritage, as well as the many representations that I understand it received from other organisations, local people and, of course, my hon. Friend.

In determining such planning applications, the council will, I am sure, have paid close regard to the likely effect of the proposed development on the setting of nearby listed buildings and the character and appearance of the conservation area. Indeed, planning Acts require them to do so. The two main planning policy guidance notes relevant to the case appear to be PPG15 on planning and the historic environment and PPG3 on housing.

PPG15 provides a full statement of the Government's policies for the identification and protection of historic buildings, conservation areas and other elements of the historic environment, and then explains the role of the planning system in their protection. It explains the importance of early consultation with the local planning authority on development proposals that would affect historic sites. The planning guidance also emphasises the importance of the requirements, set out in planning Acts, for local planning authorities to pay special regard to the effect of the development on the setting of listed buildings, and to the desirability of preserving or enhancing the character of conservation areas, when considering applications for planning permission. It is important to remind the House that that planning guidance exists, and that local authorities are expected to pay due regard to it.

The aspects of PPG3 relevant to this subject are the requirements to give priority to the reuse of previously developed land in urban areas, to make efficient use of land by building in a net density of no less than 30 dwellings to the hectare, and to promote good design in new housing developments.

Proposals to build near listed buildings, and in or close to conservation areas, can, as the proposals for Port Sunlight amply demonstrate, lead to considerable debate about the form that the development should take, and indeed about whether any development should be allowed at all. It is a most difficult balancing exercise. It is disappointing that the development permitted at Port Sunlight caused such strong local opposition, particularly if, as my hon. Friend suggested, a better solution might have been achieved through more meaningful dialogue. It is for the local planning authority to ensure that there is proper consultation on these matters. My hon. Friend's points about the future and about the importance of effective dialogue are well made and, I hope, will be well received.

I tend to agree with my hon. Friend that if similar problems are to be avoided in future, it may be prudent for the trust and the borough council to agree a master plan for the village after appropriate consultation, particularly with local residents. That can only be of benefit to the site, but of course it is for those parties, and not the Government, to decide. Under the new regime in the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004, it is open to the local authority to develop an area action plan, and that would feed into the wider local development framework. I hope that that will provide opportunities for taking this matter forward.

My hon. Friend mentioned that he is chairing a conference that is taking place this year with English Heritage on the future of the site; I am sure that that, alongside the planning process currently in train, will provide another opportunity to consider the many issues that he has raised, and will provide a good opportunity to think afresh about the way forward. I congratulate him on securing this debate, and on making an impassioned plea on a topic that is clearly of great concern to his constituents.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Before I call Norman Lamb, I should say that a Division is likely at some stage, and when that happens, I shall suspend the sitting for 15 minutes.

Shoreline Management (Norfolk)

4.30 pm

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): I am very pleased to raise an issue of great concern to people in my constituency. I am also pleased to see the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) in the Chamber. We have worked together on the issue, and I think that our views on it are similar.

The draft shoreline management plan has hit coastal communities in north Norfolk like a bombshell. Some of the people most directly affected are present today. They feel strongly about the issue and its impact on their futures and livelihoods. I hope that the Minister will also take their concerns seriously and understand why they feel as strongly as they do.

My purpose today is to inform the Minister of the local reaction to the draft plan, which has been prepared in accordance with his Department's approach as outlined in the consultation document "Making Space For Water". As the Minister will know, we are in the middle of our own consultation process on the draft plan. It is fair to say that there is great public cynicism these days about the process of consultation. Most people assume that decisions have already been taken and that whatever the reaction to such a consultation exercise, it will make no difference. My first question to the Minister is therefore whether he will listen to what we are saying and act on the genuine and serious challenges that we are making to the proposals.

It is important to make a few things clear. I do not claim to speak as an expert on coastal erosion and I do not claim fully to understand, for example, the impact of offshore dredging. However, I speak on behalf of a number of coastal communities who feel deeply disturbed by a change in approach that threatens their homes, their security and in some cases everything that they have ever worked for.

I accept and understand that the management of the coastline is a massive challenge for any Government. I can remember walking along the cliff top in the mid-1990s with the then Conservative Minister. The district council was putting forward a proposal for a defence scheme for Happisburgh and seeking grant aid from the Government. The money was not forthcoming and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food stated as its policy that "to attempt to protect every inch of coastline from change would not only be uneconomic but would work against the dynamic processes that determine the coastline and could have an adverse effect elsewhere and on the natural environment."

That was the Government's position in 1993.

I also understand that erosion of the coast has been going on for centuries. Many lost villages along the coast of East Anglia bear testament to that. None the less, people want their homes and communities protected. That is their main wish and top priority.

I am also aware of the potential impact of climate change. We are told that the country is tilting, with the east coast dropping by a millimetre or two every year. With climate change causing sea levels to rise by 4 or 5 mm a year, the combined effect is that the sea level is rising by about 6 mm a year. Given that much of north and east Norfolk is close to sea level, the potential implications are clear for everyone to see.

We do not approach the subject seeking to deny clear and stark facts. But we demand that people are treated fairly and in accordance with the principles of social justice. I want to demonstrate to the Minister the immediate impact of the publication of the draft plan. The plan, as he will know, contains maps, which are already inaccurate because of the rate at which erosion is changing the contour of the coastline. Those maps show clearly properties that are expected to be lost to the sea within specified periods of time. Without the plan's even having been approved, there has been an immediate and significant impact on property values, particularly in certain locations, on the saleability of property and on people's ability to secure a mortgage and to obtain insurance.

However, the impact goes well beyond the properties shown to be at risk on the shoreline management plans. Predicting the rate of erosion is a notoriously inexact science, as the Minister will recognise. For example, a plan drawn up for Happisburgh in 1992 by Halcrow, which is now responsible for the shoreline management plan, showed a line where the coast would be in 60 years' time. We overtook that line in 2004, after just 12 years—an inaccuracy factor of five. The uncertainty that results from the inexact nature of the science means that the plans have blighted far more properties than might be imagined. Just last weekend, I heard about a property situated a mile from the coast that had lost 25 per cent. of its value. It is in no realistic danger for a considerable time, but it is suffering the real effect on property values.

Let me read from a letter from a constituent, who makes the point very well:

"My wife and I moved to Overstrand—"

one of the villages affected—

"just over two years ago. Because of my wife's ill health we decided to move from our current period property to a bungalow which would be easier for her to manage. We received and accepted an offer for our property in the middle of January and had an offer for a bungalow accepted. The moving process was well under way and we anticipated completion by the middle of March. Last week, our buyer pulled out because of the present uncertainty regarding the future of Overstrand. They were very keen to move to Overstrand and they had registered their children at the local school".

That is an example of the impact of the proposed shoreline management plan on two families. It is having a devastating effect and must not be allowed to go forward.

In the past few weeks, we have held public meetings in Happisburgh, Bacton, Mundesley and Overstrand. About 1,000 people have attended, at very short notice. That number in itself demonstrates the strength of feeling on the issue. People have told me of their circumstances both at those meetings and by letter. How does the Minister respond to people who have purchased property in the past few years, when the official policy was to hold the line, to defend the coastline? They are likely to have bought with the benefit of a mortgage, and could suddenly be plunged into negative equity. They will be left paying off their mortgages in the knowledge that there will be little or no capital asset left when they have finished paying.

The situation has been described as "a creeping paralysis" by Clive Stockton, deputy leader of the district council and a business owner in the village of Happisburgh, who is here today. His business is a pub, which is profitable and successful. He has now had it valued at less than half what it cost to buy 14 years ago. That illustrates the real and current impact of the plan. I challenge the Minister to tell us whether he believes that it is socially just that a generation of people who happen to own properties in the affected villages could lose everything as a result of the Government's decision that it is too expensive to defend the coastline. What is disturbing is the absence of any indication that the Government recognise the human cost of effectively abandoning stretches of coastline.

I want to consider the matter of compensation. I understand that in France there is a compensation scheme called, in a typically French way, a solidarity fund. The Minister will be aware that I have written to him about compensation. When he wrote back to me on 16 November 2004, he confirmed that there were "no current plans" to introduce a compensation scheme, and that there was "nothing to discuss". However, I have spoken to civil servants in his Department who tell me that the matter is being considered. In his letter, the Minister did, perhaps, hint at the possibility of some movement, when he recognised that the issue was "of great interest", and that the Government would consider in the Government response to the consultation "Making Space For Water".

"the issues further with a view to clarifying future policy and its implications"

The introduction of the compensation scheme would immediately address the problem of blight. Our suggestion is that payment is made at the point when the property is lost to the sea, and that it is based on the value of that property without the problem of erosion. I recognise that such a scheme must be carefully designed, and I understand that any Government must be careful about open-ended commitments, but the case for such a scheme is overwhelming. It would immediately address the problem of blight described in the letter that I read to the Minister, because it would give people renewed confidence to buy into these communities. Purchasers would know that their investment was safe. What hope can the Minister give those communities that do not have such a scheme?

Importantly, the scheme would also have another very beneficial effect. At the moment, a decision to abandon a stretch of coastline is a no-cost option for any Government, so it looks very attractive. A compensation scheme would force any Government to judge more effectively whether to abandon the coastline or to defend it. They would have to balance the cost of compensation against the cost of defence.

I therefore directly challenge the Minister on this crucial subject. Does he accept that the principle of compensation is being discussed in his Department? Does he acknowledge that the publication of the shoreline management plan has now made this an urgent and pressing issue, because of its immediate impact on communities? Does he also accept the real and serious risk of blight in coastal communities unless the Government act?

Two other issues have not been adequately dealt with in the draft shoreline management plan—the impact of dredging, and the basis on which we establish the total cost of what is at risk if coastal erosion is not controlled.

Extraordinarily, given its implications, the draft shoreline management plan says little about dredging. It states:

"Whether or not there are links between offshore dredging and coastal erosion is uncertain".

That is all it says, but at least it acknowledges that the impact is uncertain. I become very frustrated when I hear the dogmatic assertion that dredging has no effect on the rate of erosion.

I pay tribute to Malcolm Kerby of the coastal concern action group, who is in the Chamber today. He has put body and soul into representing the interests of these communities, and does it very responsibly. He and I, and Peter Frew from North Norfolk district council, travelled to Brussels some time ago to meet Stefan Lombardo, who was head of the research project Eurosion, which is funded by the European Commission. He made it clear that offshore dredging could increase the rate of erosion. One must examine each case to determine the potential impact. Furthermore, he made it clear that he was not satisfied that the process of environmental impact assessments in applications for dredging licences was robust enough. The precautionary principle must be applied.

The problem is that substantial sums of money are made from dredging. In 2002 alone, the Crown estate received £5.2 million, which is 40 per cent. of its total income from the whole country, from marine minerals dredging off the Norfolk coast alone. The construction industry inevitably demands ever-increasing volumes of aggregate to meet, apart from anything else, the Government's own building plans.

When the Minister replied to a parliamentary question from me back in January 2004, he confirmed that research was under way on the impact of dredging. Will he provide any more information on the outcome of that research? I know that research has been done, but what about the research that he said was under way last year?

Many people argue that until we have a greater understanding of the impact of dredging, there should be a moratorium on dredging anywhere close to the coast. There must surely at least be a case for tougher assessment of new licence applications. Alternatively, there is surely a case for some of the revenues raised from dredging to be used for defending our coastline, or for building up a compensation fund.

The draft shoreline management plan presents a false picture of the real cost of doing nothing. Appendix H.3.1.1 states that "losses and benefits have been calculated only on the basis of residential and commercial property values. Other assets, such as utilities, and highways, and intangibles such as recreation, impacts on the local economy or environment, have not been valued or included".

That makes nonsense of the whole plan. Surely, before taking decisions on how to progress with something so fundamental, which affects so many people's lives, we should have a clear understanding of the full cost and of the impact on the Norfolk broads, tourism, relocation of communities and our precious heritage.

It is ludicrous that a decision of the district council to refuse an application for planning permission in a place close to the cliff edge where it is ludicrous to build new properties can be overturned on appeal by Government inspectors. I accept that that is not the responsibility of the Minister's Department, but it is a failure of joined-up government.

[Norman Lamb]

The draft shoreline management plan is fatally flawed. It touches on the crucial issue of dredging in one sentence, but reaches no conclusion; it says nothing about the real social and economic impact of abandoning the coastline; it cannot address compensation because that would require Government action; and it fails properly to identify the full cost of doing nothing. Unless and until those crucial issues are addressed, the plan will be overwhelmingly rejected by local people and, no doubt, by members of North Norfolk district council.

Finally, I repeat my request to the Minister to meet local people. Will he meet them, preferably in Norfolk but, if not, here? This matter is crucial to them, and they deserve the chance to tell him their views directly, as well as having me represent them and put forward their views.

4.46 pm

Mr. Anthony D. Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): I take it that the hon. Gentleman has the permission of both the Member who secured the debate and the Minister?

Mr. Wright: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall be brief because I respect the fact that this is the debate of the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb); I simply want to make a few pertinent points. The hon. Gentleman has made all his points admirably and I agree with many of them.

As far as the coastline is concerned, my responsibility for my constituents is from Winterton down to Hopton. Some issues affecting that area may be different to those raised by the hon. Gentleman, but I want to raise one or two relevant issues with the Minister, some of which have been touched on. The first such issue has been raised by my constituents. Responsibility for different parts of the coastline falls to different agencies. In one area in Winterton, it is probable that Great Yarmouth district council is responsible for one part and the Environment Agency for another. We should consider making one agency responsible for the whole coastline.

Property blight, on which the hon. Gentleman touched, will probably affect many areas along the coastline. There is also the issue of planning blight. Most planning legislation looks only 20 years ahead. Development is already under way in areas that could be lost. What should we tell people when issuing land searches?

Important wildlife habitats could be under threat should the shoreline management plan go ahead. We have limited or no resources to fund coastal defence work through the borough council strategy. New sea walls would cost around £10,000 a metre; one groyne would cost around £30,000. Are more resources available? Is there a relationship with offshore dredging? The report says conclusively that there is no scientific evidence; I call again for the immediate cessation of at least the export of aggregates, which would reduce the need for dredging by 40 per cent.

The SMPs were prepared using guidance and methodology provided by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. Perhaps that is why issues such as social justice are not considered. In nature's terms, the coastline is totally interrelated; what is taken from one part must affect another. If North Norfolk district council invests in defences and we further south do not, the coastline lower down will suffer accelerated erosion.

Will the Minister consider our proposal for an underwriting scheme under which the Government may pay the market value for properties that are lost? That would enable them to withdraw from sea defence expenditure in certain areas without punishing those who live in affected areas. Will they take control of all coastal protection issues in order to give consistency, put resources in place and deal with defence?

I shall end now as I realise that the hon. Member for North Norfolk needs to receive a response. I simply wanted to put my points forward as the MP for a constituency with a substantial amount of coastline.

4.49 pm

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) on securing the debate. He has written to me on several occasions and I am aware of local residents' concern. I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. Gentleman about many of the points that he raised. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) has also been very active on behalf of his constituents, and has written in similar vein.

I want to respond by setting out the strategy in context. There has been some misinformation on the issue and people have been misled. Also, many people want to look for simplistic solutions when the situation involving coastal dynamics is complex.

The hon. Member for North Norfolk will know that the Government have provided major increases in investment for the funding of flood and coastal erosion risk management in recent years. That is set to continue in the next three-year spending period. However, we cannot mislead people and suggest that we can defend every inch of the coastline. I know that the hon. Gentleman was being very reasonable and realistic about that in the case that he made.

The issue is not just finance but sustainability, technical solutions and what will work. My understanding is that the original shoreline plan, even where it currently recommends holding the line, was arrived at by overruling the expert engineers and consultants. They advised local authorities at that time that the defences were not sustainable and would not withstand the coastal movement and dynamics that were involved. They have been proved right.

Norman Lamb: Will the Minister at least accept that it is reasonable for local people to work on the basis of what the shoreline management plan said? Whether or not it was made by overruling experts, it was the plan that local people worked on.

Mr. Morley: I accept that local people would not have been aware that expert advice was overruled on the basis of a very similar argument to the one being made in the current round of consultations. I also want to make it clear that the Government are committed to social justice, given the increasing risks connected to climate change and development. However, we must set priorities for who gets schemes first, on the basis of need. We have tried to operate them in an open and transparent way, through such things as a priority scoring system, so that people can see their position on the list and why the scores have been set as they have. That is new, and we have done it so that we can be open and honest with people, and not mislead them.

DEFRA encourages operating authorities to take a strategic approach to flood and coastal defence problems. As part of that, it has indeed issued guidance for coastal defence authorities, to assist with the preparation of shoreline management plans. Those plans are designed to enable a strategic approach to be taken to flood and coastal defence works along the coastline, based on the detailed understanding of its natural processes, planning issues, current and future land use, defence needs and environmental considerations. All the points that the hon. Gentleman raised about infrastructure and the Norfolk broads are taken into account in relation to shoreline management plans.

The draft SMP for north Norfolk is one of three to be used to carry out a trial of guidance for the second generation of SMPs; the aim is to provide a large-scale assessment of the risks associated with coastal processes and present a policy framework for reducing risks to people and the developed, historical and natural environment, in a sustainable manner. Those are the very points that the hon. Gentleman raised.

The draft was published in December last year and people living in North Norfolk, Great Yarmouth and Waveney are being asked for their views on how the coastline from Kelling to Lowestoft Ness should be managed. The consultation ends on 31 March. The work is funded by DEFRA and is the culmination of two years' work by engineering consultants who have been appointed by, and work for, North Norfolk district council, Great Yarmouth borough council, Waveney district council, the Environment Agency, English Nature and Great Yarmouth port authority. They engage experts and consider the coastal dynamics.

The draft SMP has, of course, not been completed. It has not been sent to DEFRA for agreement. That happens at the end of the process. I have not seen the details of the shoreline management plan. I am not involved in such matters, nor should I be. It is a locally-led process and it should be based on local consultation. The hon. Gentleman raised many points. If there were errors in the plan, the consultation process is the right way in which to deal with such matters and to bring about amendments. He asked me to meet residents, but that would be a pointless exercise. I am interested in people's views, and he knows that I read his letters in great detail, but there is nothing that I can input into the shoreline management plan because it is determined locally. I will not see the final plan until it is complete and sent to me. People are being misled if they think that, by lobbying me, the plan will change.

Norman Lamb: But the Minister knows that, even under his existing priority scoring scheme, there is no chance of the communities having a scheme that will meet the criteria to obtain funding. It is nonsense to suggest that there is any possibility of their obtaining funding from DEFRA. The process is being driven by DEFRA. The Minister has already said that the new shoreline management plan is being prepared on the basis of guidance from his Department and in accordance with "Making Space for Water", which was issued last October. He cannot opt out of it.

Mr. Morley: I repeat that I have no input into the shoreline management plan. Each one has to be designed to take into account local circumstances and needs, and that is right and proper. I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's argument. There are communities that think that they are facing immediate threat, but which may not face a threat for 50 or 60 years. At present, the scheme could cost millions and defend houses in single figures, but in 50 years the cost-benefit analysis and the scoring system may have changed. It is likely that there will be several revisions of the shoreline management plan during that time. So it is wrong therefore for people to think that they are immediately under threat, that the shoreline management plan will be the only shoreline management plan and that there will not be changes in the future. It is true that some people may be more immediately affected than others, but we must recognise that those are the circumstances of the case.

As for assistance to communities—my time is short, so I must be quick—I confirm that there are no current plans for compensation. The present arrangements have been the same for all Governments. I note that that is also Liberal Democrat policy. It is certainly the Conservative party's policy, although we are in a pre-election period and I very much fear that some people will make all sorts of false and unsustainable promises. I am trying to be honest about such matters.

As for our plan, we recognise the impact on communities so we are considering issues further with a view to clarifying future policy and its implications. We hope to publish a formal response soon to the points that have been made on such issues as part of the consultation on "Making Space for Water". Compensation is one of several different approaches to help individuals and communities adapt to change. However, there has never been a compensation scheme in this country, given that we provide coastal defences under permissive powers. The implications are not only for Norfolk. If a scheme is introduced, it will apply throughout the country. We must then ask ourselves whether it should be applied to flood victims or people who have already lost their homes to coastal erosion. It is difficult.

I am always open to evidence that aggregate dredging is a problem. We insist that a coastal impact study is carried out to provide information on a scheme to make sure that proposed dredging is far enough off shore to ensure that there is no beach draw-down into deepened areas. There has not been evidence that offshore dredging has caused coastal erosion. We keep an open mind on such matters. We look for such evidence, but those people who say that it does cause coastal erosion have an obligation to bring forward the evidence. None has been forthcoming from any source, including the European Union source that was mentioned. No criticism has been made of the environmental impact assessment study that is applied in such cases. I regret that my time is coming to a close. The hon. Member for North Norfolk might wish to raise other points with me as a result of the debate and I shall be only too pleased to answer them in further detail.

[Mr. Morley]

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 9 March 2005

[MR. EDWARD O'HARA in the Chair]

Coal Industry

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Ainger.]

9.30 am

Mr. Denis Murphy (Wansbeck) (Lab): I should like to thank the House for allowing me this debate.

On 26 January this year, UK Coal stunned everyone in the north-east by announcing the premature closure of Ellington colliery, with the loss of 370 jobs. The behaviour of the company in the run-up to that announcement and subsequently has been scandalous—I shall return to that later.

Electricity generation in Britain is currently fuelled by coal at 34 per cent., gas at 36 per cent. and nuclear at 22 per cent., with oil, hydro and renewables contributing the remaining 8 per cent. Those figures vary slightly depending on price and availability, but that is the general market share.

We are moving away from the dash for gas, but are in the midst of a dash for renewables. Although there is no doubt that renewables will make a contribution and now command all the political and public attention, there are genuine question marks against their efficiency. Unit costs for renewables are high per kilowatt installed, production is variable, they are unreliable for base load production and it is doubtful whether they will ever deliver value for money. Nevertheless, they are required in order to broaden our energy base. However, I doubt whether we will meet our ambitious targets in the proposed time scale.

The nuclear industry is regarded by many as holding the key to Britain's long-term electricity requirements. However, it does not offer a quick fix. There is a long lead-in time for project implementation and the lack of smaller and more flexible units makes the nuclear option expensive. The nuclear industry can and should continue to play an important role in the medium term. As a nation, we need to debate whether we want a new generation of nuclear power stations to provide a longer-term solution. Everyone recognises the need for secure electricity supplies, yet no one wants to live near a nuclear power station. The debate promises to be interesting.

Over the past 15 years, the dash for gas—the fuel seen then as a more efficient and cleaner energy source than the alternatives—has resulted in a significant decrease in the nation's gas reserves. It is well known that domestic UK gas supplies are diminishing, and that we will need to import large amounts of gas to feed the new generating capacity. There will be huge capital costs, as well as high gas prices to be paid. Liquid natural gas requires capital-intensive transport infrastructure, which requires liquefying plants, refrigeration and pressurisation ships, and gasification stations at UK ports.

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): I am listening carefully to the powerful case that my hon. Friend is making, but has he noticed where the imported gas is likely to come from? It will come from thousands of kilometres away, through areas that are subject to civil disorder, earthquake zones and so on. The pipelines will be vulnerable to attack, will they not? Is that not a further factor in considering an energy policy that relies largely on gas?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend makes a fair point.

Coal-fired power generation constitutes some 34 per cent. of the total in this country—surprisingly, 2 points up from the use figure in 2002—and requires some 53 million tonnes of coal a year. Of that, approximately 20 million tonnes is produced in the United Kingdom. In my view, we will continue to need upwards of 50 million tonnes of coal each year for the next 20 years. The argument, therefore, is not whether we use coal or another fuel; rather, it is whether we use British coal or source coal from surplus world supplies.

The greatest number of job offers that the unemployed miners at Ellington have received have not come from the new business parks on Tyneside 12 miles away, as one would have expected. Rather, they have come from 12,000 miles away, from New Zealand, a nation desperately short of skilled miners as it seeks to expand its mining industry. An article in The New Zealand Herald stated:

"State-owned miner Solid Energy is offering unemployed British miners jobs" because of the company's rapid expansion and because

"it doesn't have time to train New Zealanders . . . Solid Energy is due to visit Northumberland in the next few weeks" to interview miners from the 150 responses that it has received. Chief operating officer Barry Bragg said:

"A lot of projects are under way and we need to get them running."

and the company intended to offer a fresh start down under to those miners

"who have been cast aside by the British mining industry."

Solid Energy's chief executive Don Elder said that

"known global oil and gas reserves would be largely exhausted within 20 to 50 years, but abundant and accessible coal reserves would last more than 200 years."

That should surely send a warning to us all.

Every country with a coal-mining industry is expanding coal production and, in some cases, coal burn. In the United States, both main candidates in the 2004 presidential election proposed major investment in the US coal sector, especially for clean coal technology, in order to protect energy security and upgrade the environment. Similar proposals for expanding coal production are being made in Germany, where the cost of production is far higher than in the UK. However, such decisions are not being left to market forces. Energy security lies at the heart of the German Government's energy policy.

China and India require vast amounts of power to fuel their predicted growth. Most of that energy will come from coal. China alone wishes to build another 20 large coal-fired power stations. Had we as a nation invested in the development of clean coal technology, we could have sold those countries that technology. Instead, we have watched our research and development wither on the vine, where once we led the world.

[Mr. Murphy]

What then of Britain's largest and most reliable source of fuel, coal? The first question must be: what on earth happened to an industry that 20 years ago employed 180,000 people at 200 sites? Have we learned anything from the mistakes of the Thatcher and Major Governments? They virtually threw away the bulk of the UK deep-mined industry, at enormous cost and in the face of the definitive run-down of UK oil and gas reserves. The cost amounted to £30 billion in today's money, in redundancy and pit closure costs, written-off investment for closed mines, and wider economic and social costs.

Some major costs persist even to this day, including long-term unemployment and ill health. A report recently published by Sheffield Hallam university highlighted the problem, particularity in south Wales and my own area, Northumberland, where it has not been possible to replace the massive number of jobs lost from mining.

I would, however, congratulate the Government on the many initiatives that they have put in place to address those problems. Such initiatives are genuinely making a difference in former mining areas. Without the operating aid and the investment aid, I doubt whether we would have an industry left to debate. However, has that aid been too little and, as far as the industry's owners are concerned, too late?

That brings me to the company that owns the bulk of the remaining surface and deep-mined sector, UK Coal. In my view, and, more surprisingly, in that of many in the City, UK Coal is not able to carry out its mining functions. It is a company rapidly turning into a land and property developer, and it will use any excuse to rid itself of its responsibilities and, if necessary, its contracts.

The work force at Ellington experienced at first hand what was, at best, the incompetence of the directors, or—what is more likely—a deliberate act of industrial vandalism not seen for decades. There is no doubt that the coal face was flooded. There was never any doubt that the face could have been pumped dry and production commenced quickly and safely. Every person at the pit, many of whom had more than 30 years' experience, knew that to be the case. They were horrified when Mr. Spindler, the chief executive, visited the mine and, within three seconds of speaking to the trade union, announced its closure.

I am indebted to my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and E-Commerce and to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for their personal intervention in trying to persuade UK Coal to allow the work force a few more days to prove that they could recover the coal face. I am afraid that those requests, along with many more, were rejected. UK Coal refused point blank, saying that if the pit was not unsafe, it was uneconomic.

UK Coal cannot be allowed to sterilise any more of the nation's reserves. It currently mines coal that provides 20 per cent. of Britain's electricity. It has invoked force majeure at Drax power station, and there are serious doubts as to whether it can fulfil its contract at Alcan's power station in my constituency, at which 1 million tonnes of coal a year are burned, and which was previously supplied from Ellington colliery.

I do not trust UK Coal to be the guardian of the nation's coal reserves. It does not value its employees; it must be the only company in Britain that produces a comprehensive annual report in which it does not even mention the contribution of the people who work for it. It is time that someone investigated UK Coal's real agenda, to enable us better to determine a future for this industry. I am pleased that the National Union of Mineworkers has started to do just that. It commissioned a report by a team of City energy and finance experts to provide an overview and assessment of UK Coal plc.

The report makes interesting reading. It looks in some detail at the UK power generation and distribution sector and explains the changes that have taken place since the privatisation of the industry in 1990: the buy-outs, the distress sales and the spectacular collapse of British Energy in 2003. It also explains the huge losses made by high street banks and financial institutions through underperforming loans. Although accurate figures are, understandably, hard to come by, the City informally estimates the losses to be in the order of £4 billion to £6 billion through bad debt. I am sure that more noises would have been made were it not for the huge profits that the banks were making in other operations.

The losses have left their scars on investors, who now take a much shorter-term view of opportunities in the sector. Earnings per share and positive short-term cash flows are a much higher priority than long-term prospects or social issues, and quick-exit strategies are usually part of the investment plan, which tends to favour smaller, more flexible power plants and gas instead of coal or nuclear power.

Structural changes to the market have allowed 50 per cent. of it to be bought by non-UK state-owned enterprises from Germany and France, which operate in a protected market at home. Another consequence of the short-termism of financiers has been the reduction of reserve capacity in the system. Many observers say that it has dropped below prudent levels. Electricity cuts could well occur in the United Kingdom before any new major generating capacity can be installed. The report states:

"The scenario as described portrays an inherently unstable resource system. The general public remains blissfully unaware of the risks being run, and are themselves happy as the price of electricity has been reduced by 30 per cent. in real terms since privatisation. But today much of the UK's power system, comprising essentially of long term assets is being funded by relatively short term money. Not a good recipe for long term stability."

On the mining industry, the report comments on both open-cast and deep-mining. On open-cast, it draws the logical conclusion that planning constraints are a problem in expanding the sector. On deep-mining it says:

"The question now is not just can coal production recover, but given its present outlook is it sustainable at all"?

It is useful to reflect on the sector's financial characteristics, and the Selby closure is a classic example. Riccall colliery, the last mine at UK Coal's Selby complex, mined its last coal in October 2004.

When the closure plans were first put forward, the Aire valley marker was 95p a gigajoule—a long way below the levels of 1994. Since then, spot prices have climbed even higher to 170p a gigajoule. Although I am sure that the Selby complex would have had to close at some stage, its closure in 1994 was in many ways premature. The low spot price coupled with the big mine infrastructure hastened its demise. It is hard to believe, however, that there are not recoverable coal reserves at 170p a gigajoule.

In preparing the report, the authors interviewed an engineer who had spent a decade in the design and management of mines in the Selby complex. He no longer works in the industry, but he believes that considerable value could be unlocked from some of the coal deposits in the Selby area with relatively small new investment.

Of course, another factor in the closure of the Selby complex was the anticipated redevelopment value of the land on the surface. Finance brokers' notes in August 2004 talked of Gascoigne Wood having 270,000 sq ft of undeveloped land, which could be of use to a company wishing to set up a distribution operation, especially as it has 8 miles of sidings. That was only a small part of the land bank.

The report concludes by discussing the strengths and weaknesses of the three chief executives that the company has had since privatisation. It concludes that it is too early to judge Mr. Spindler's reign, and says that he appears to be taking a hard-headed and unsentimental approach to UK Coal's mining operations. It continues:

"UK Coal is now seen in the City as a company whose principle assets are land holdings and were it not for the coal operations—the financing of which are rather opaque and bring with them some scary potential liabilities—the Companies shares would probably trade much higher. The property holdings were very conservatively valued in 2002 at £174 million, virtually the same as the entire market value of UK Coal in February 2005 of £190 million. The property assets should in time be worth a great deal more than this, so where does this leave coal mining?"

It goes on:

"It is clear that UK Coal has suffered from some adverse geological conditions in some mines, but that is all part of the deep mining business. What really seems to have hit recent performances are somewhat curious management decisions."

For example, it asks:

"Why did UK Coal sell so much output to Drax their most important customer which in turn is owned by a consortium of banks and then declare Force Majeure on the sales contract?"

It asks:

"Why does UK Coal work only one face at a time in each mine, resulting in big production and financial losses during face gaps?"

It goes on to ask:

"Why does UK Coal seemingly not engage with and value the inputs from its workforce?"

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to intervene at Ellington once more. The NUM has secured the services of a mining engineer, Mr. Kenneth Johnson from Ashington, who is an expert on the coal seams and geology of the Northumberland coalfield. He is preparing a business plan to mine a section of coal at the Bewick Drift area of Ellington. We need time to develop that plan fully, and I ask the Minister to prevent those reserves from being sterilised by UK Coal's rush to close the pit in record time. We have a ready market on the doorstep, and that coal could be mined safely and profitably.

I conclude with a final quotation from the financial report. It says:

"From a national security perspective, the deep mining industry in Britain is too important to be allowed to wither under UK Coal's dubious stewardship. A credible alternative needs to be created. This should be possible using the considerable expertise available in Britain to operate these pits which can produce coal at or below the current market price."

UK Coal has demonstrated that it is first and foremost a property and land development company. When it comes to a decision on mining coal or closing and developing the valuable land resource, it will always choose the latter. The City puts no cash value on its mining operations, and it is well known that the value of its shares will rise dramatically if it is rid of mining. That is not a company in which the nation's coal reserve should be vested.

I urge the Minister to examine the setting up of a new company for which the only priority is the mining of coal and which will pay huge dividends to the British people through a long-term supply of coal to the power stations. Network Rail is an excellent example of the type of company that could deliver the nation's coal supplies for many years to come.

9.49 am

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) (Lab): I am very pleased to take part in this debate and support what my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy) has said. I assure hon. Members that anything I say about Government policy or the Government's attitude towards coal is based on experience and is in no way critical of colleagues, because I have been there, got the t-shirt and know the difficulties for people such as my hon. Friend who try to argue the case for coal in an environment that is essentially not well-disposed towards it.

I want to see a change of approach to coal. After the next election there has to be another fairly major review of energy policy and the energy mix that this country is moving towards, which will give us the opportunity to cast aside the legacy of attitudes that still exist towards coal. In my experience, coal was always viewed as a problem; it was always looking for subsidy, and giving rise to short-term problems at particular pits. Somehow it was never possible to get out of that morass long enough to look forward to see what coal contributed, could contribute and—for the reasons outlined by my hon. Friend—must contribute to the energy needs of this country for a very long time to come.

I agree with what my hon. Friend says about UK Coal. It makes no sense whatever to leave such a massive national asset as our coal reserves in the hands of a single private company, no matter how diligent, let alone a company that has the somewhat mixed record of UK Coal. A major asset that may or, arguably, may not be needed at present cannot be sterilised in the short term on the basis of random commercial decisions when it is absolutely certain that it will be needed in future. That issue does not relate simply to the current behaviour of UK Coal; it must surely be a philosophical principle that no commercial interest can sterilise a national asset.

[Mr. Brian Wilson]

If we accept that as a starting point, other things flow. We need not only an audit of the nation's coal assets, but a clear assessment of the measures necessary to safeguard future access to them. That can be done only as one comprehensive project; it cannot be done in an isolated way from case to case as crisis after crisis arises. After the election, if there is to be a new look at where our future electricity supplies will come from, I hope that the question of preventing the sterilisation of the nation's coal reserves will have a high priority.

I shall explain quickly why coal should matter and should be viewed in a much more positive light than has been the case in the past. My hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck touched on the fact that whatever happens in the United Kingdom, coal will continue to be burned on a gargantuan scale in the world as a whole. As he knows, in my role as a trade representative, I was in China recently and the Chinese were talking merrily about increasing production from 1.6 billion tonnes to 2.2 billion tonnes in order to fuel economic expansion. Incidentally, they are also going to build 20 nuclear power stations—sound people, the Chinese.

The question is not whether the Chinese are going to burn coal, but whether they burn it in the old way, which would be an environmental disaster, or whether they burn it using clean coal technology, much of which, as my hon. Friend said, could be supplied—in fairness, some already is—from the UK. The other question is whether they are going to burn it in a way that continues to kill 10,000 miners a year, or whether they will benefit—I am pleased to say—from the contacts that they now have with our Health and Safety Executive.

Whatever happens in this country, coal will be the major source of fuel globally. China, India, the Philippines and most of south-east Asia will burn coal, and America will continue to view coal as its major fuel source. That creates the opportunity for our manufacturing and technological industries to develop clean coal technology, which we are very good at. The UK's strength could be in carbon capture and allying the needs of the coal industry with the resources and accommodation available in the North sea.

The Government have to play a part in that. I am not criticising them, because I faced exactly the same problems that they do, but there has to be some Government money to kick-start the process. It is unrealistic to think that there can be a global, clean coal technology industry in the UK without also having a domestic market, including demonstration plants and so on. We need just enough to get things going to serve the needs of our coal industry, and we need to create the base for manufacturing industry and our very important exporting industry. If we consider the statistics for coal use and the demand there will be for clean coal technology if coal-burning countries are meet their Kyoto obligations, we can see that there is a corresponding massive opportunity for manufacturing and exporting in the UK.

The other reason why coal is important and why we should be positive about it as we look to the future is that, as my hon. Friend said, a third of our electricity still comes from coal. Most people would find that a surprising statistic because all publicity about coal is unremittingly negative and suggests that coal is somehow a thing of the past. Even more crucially, at periods of peak demand that figure rises to around 45 per cent. In other words, if we do not have coal for the foreseeable future, the lights will go out; coal is as important as that.

The two questions are where coal comes from and how it is burnt. The question of how it is burnt has to be rhetorical because we simply cannot go on burning coal in an environmentally unhelpful manner, as is still the case in many power stations at present. We cannot switch on dirty old coal-powered stations when we need extra supply without taking account of the environmental consequences. The reason why our carbon emissions have risen in recent years rather than fallen, as one would like to see them doing, is probably the reliance not only on coal but on dirty coal stations. Coal will have to be burnt cleanly, and there is no point talking about a future for coal without linking it to clean coal technology.

We cannot and should not go much below that 33 per cent. figure of energy from coal if we are going to maintain a balanced energy policy. The message I preach is that it is a false argument to pit renewables against coal, coal against nuclear or nuclear against renewables; those are all subsidiary arguments. The only argument that matters is how dependent we are prepared to become on gas, and when we talk about gas, we now mean imported gas.

Based on the Government's projections, 70 per cent. of our electricity will come from gas by 2020, and 90 per cent. of that will be imported. I do not think that the great British public have latched on to that; it is something that will not happen by accident, but through a strategy that is being pursued as desirable. I know the arguments—they may be true—for saying that everything will be all right on the night: the gas will be there, the liquefied natural gas terminals are being built already, pipelines are being planned, and there is also the Orman Lange treaty, which I was delighted to see my hon. Friend the Minister conclude.

All those are reasons why the gas might be there, but there are two questions. First, there is the question of overdependence on strategic policy decisions taken in one country—Russia. Secondly, the gas will be there but at what price? Twice during my time as the Minister there were massive spikes in the price of gas, with very serious consequences for industries in this country that are heavily gas dependent. I tried hard, as I am sure my hon. Friend the Minister has done since, to get to the bottom of those spikes, but was told, "We don't really know. It happened in the interconnector". That is interesting but not very impressive as a basis for a future energy policy based on much of our gas coming into the market through interconnectors.

Do we want 70 per cent. of our electricity to come from gas? Do we want 90 per cent. of that gas to be imported? If we do not, we must maintain a more balanced energy supply. That supply must fit with our environmental obligations. Therefore, we come back to using renewables—yes, I am in favour of renewables—but we also come back to nuclear power and to clean coal, which is, in the context of the debate, the most relevant point. In other words, we must try to maintain an indigenous energy policy.

I do not think that it has been noticed to the extent that it should be that since the start of the industrial revolution, Britain's prosperity has been based on the fact that we are not only a massive energy producer but a massive exporter to the world. If we head the way that we are going, we are contemplating becoming a massive energy importer in a short time. Circumstances change, and people will say that there is no problem being an energy importer. Like many G8 countries, for example, Germany is an energy importer. However, do we want to go that way on such a scale, in such a short time? If not, we need coal and nuclear industries and we need to do our bit on renewables. Of course we depend on some imported gas, but let us not put all our eggs in one basket.

I hope that after the election, when things can be considered in a more rational and long-term manner, the strands will be brought together and we will return to the concept of a balanced energy policy in which deep-mined British coal will continue to play a significant part.

10.2 am

David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): Life is full of changes. I am 54 years of age and have changed my position a number of times based on the circumstances in which I find myself. When I started in the pits in 1965, there were 450,000 miners in Britain. When I left the pits in 1984, there were about 130,000 miners. We are talking about the demise of the coal industry. My right hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) said clearly that the big issues that we face are about security of supply and what we want to do with all other energies.

I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy) was able to introduce this debate, which is overdue. I well understand why he raised it—it is specific to his area. However, many of us have, for a long time, thought that a major problem will face us in the not too distant future. A few years ago, it looked as though that problem was a long way away. I think that the day of reckoning is coming. I remember that an oil price hike in 1974 created major problems throughout the world, but have we forgotten about that? If we put all our eggs in one basket, in terms of how we receive our energy, we are creating a major problem for ourselves.

I am talking from a Scottish perspective, which is sometimes different from the UK position of the National Union of Mineworkers. There is an old saying in my neck of the woods: we are an island of coal, surrounded by fish. We have all those benefits. People are right when they say that other G8 countries, and other economically viable countries, can import energies, but those countries wish that they were in our position. I cannot think of many countries that are giving away what they have so that their fuel prices are determined by what comes to them.

The EU directive on emissions comes up on a regular basis. It is interesting, because Europe has a habit of making decisions and applying them differently to each country. I will watch with interest when that EU directive is applied to Poland, because I reckon that the EU will turn a blind eye to how best the issue can be dealt with there.

I said that I would talk about Scotland, which has always had the view that we must have a balanced energy supply. One of my predecessors, Alex Eadie, signed—as Energy Minister—a paper to open Torness nuclear power station under a Labour Government. A person called Tony Benn opened one of the power stations.

Mr. Wilson: He opened many power stations.

David Hamilton: Indeed, but I do not think that that is in his diaries.

I have moved from a position in which I always opposed nuclear energy. I opposed it not because I was a miner, but because of nuclear weapons. That has always been my view. However, many of the power stations that we are talking about building do not have that ingredient. Along with many of my colleagues and comrades, I take the view that there is not a competition between coal, nuclear power, gas, oil and renewables. Only two weeks ago, the energy unions all met in London. My hon. Friend the Minister spoke about what is required at that meeting. There is no competition like there was some years ago. There is enough for everyone. I strongly believe that we must address the issue on that basis.

The point has been made that we can make any decision that we want. That will not stop the United States of America, India, Africa or Australia expanding their coal industries. During the presidential election, both the Republican party and the Democrat party talked about investing £10 billion in the coal industry and in clean coal technology. The USA is driving forward because it does not have the alternatives that we do. It has got to use the coal industry to develop its proposals.

China gets 8 per cent. of its energy requirements from coal. It has one colliery that produces 10 million tonnes of coal and has 3,000 people involved in it. The expansion programme that it is talking about is not for 20 coal-fired power stations. It is talking about establishing 20 nuclear power stations and 500 coal-fired power stations. It will make clean coal technology a major ingredient of that expansion, because it recognises that it has major problems of deserts and so on. Climate change is a big issue for the Chinese—it is happening in their country. That does not stop them driving their energy requirements and their economy forward. They see coal as an integral part of that.

I believe that we, as a Government, are making a major mistake. All Governments, previously and now, have taken the view that coal can be dispensed with and that we can get it from elsewhere. I do not believe that our future lies in the middle east or in Russia. Security of energy supply is something that the people of the United Kingdom will want, and the price is worth paying. It is something that our people will work flexibly to achieve. Indeed, the miners have been working flexibly in a host of areas. A week does not go by in which the NUM does not sit down with UK Coal and others to talk about changing the flexibility of work.

It surprises me somewhat, however, that, at a meeting with the Union of Democratic Mineworkers on Thursday 24 February, my hon. Friend the Minister said that, under current working practices, he would find it difficult to go to the Treasury to ask for more money to be put into Thorsby colliery. He can clarify that point, but that is the information that we have. That suggests to me that negotiations can take place between employer and employee, but, when a Government get involved, it becomes difficult.

[David Hamilton]

I suggested that we in Scotland have taken a different view. We have always taken an optional view across the board. We have always balanced open-cast mining with deep mining. One was developed to protect the other. We have always worked on that basis. Even now, 8 million tonnes of coal is produced in Scotland in open-cast mines. I do not oppose open-cast mining, but I reject the changes in planning applications that are being considered by politicians in the Scottish Parliament. They are trying to make open-cast mining more difficult. We must consider the bigger picture. The people who oppose windmills being established in Scotland will also oppose open-cast mining. We must take a bigger view. We must consider renewables, which I encourage and support. However, we must also consider open-cast and deep mining as part of the process that we are developing.

Longannett power station will come to an end in 2015, unless it can make adaptations. The Scottish Affairs Committee is taking evidence on that. The industry will make long-term investments if it can get long-term proposals from Government that will afford it the stability to invest, but it will not invest in an industry that the Government are saying has no future. That point is extremely important.

I realise that a number of my hon. colleagues wish to speak. I believe that it is imperative that this country develops a balanced policy for energy security. The people of the United Kingdom will not thank any of us in this Chamber when the power goes off and the lights go out. We must develop a strategy that ensures that the lights will not go out in the UK, and we shall continue to support our coal industry and the people working in it.

10.11 am

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): I am delighted to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (David Hamilton), not least because I can put the record right. I was at the meeting with my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) on 24 February, and there was no question of Government aid being contingent on flexible working practices; I know that my hon. Friend the Minister will respond to that when he gets the opportunity. We were there to argue for Welbeck colliery: we followed the path trodden by my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy), who argued very strongly for Ellington colliery. I want to reinforce some of the remarks that he made about the way that UK Coal treats its work force.

UK Coal wanted new flexible working practices at Welbeck colliery, and forced them through by saying, bluntly and simply, to the men, "Unless you change the way you work, we will close the colliery at the end of this year." At Welbeck and across the United Kingdom, we have the most efficient miners in Europe, and we should be backing them, as they are prepared to take the challenge and make the change. The Government are prepared to help them make that change by ensuring that Government money is available for long-term investment in, and the sustainability of, the British deep-coal industry. The Government have made available £57 million now, of which £7.1 million is available at Welbeck—so the curious situation is that the men are prepared to back the company and work more flexibly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian said.

The Government are prepared to back the industry with real money. The real problem—the third side of the triangle—seems to be the company, UK Coal, the biggest coal owner in the country. My right hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) made a very strong point about whether market forces and the needs of the private sector should sterilise an energy reserve. We are right to question the commitment of UK Coal, not just in its relationship with the work force but in its commitment to the industry. There are Ellington and Welbeck, but the prevailing view is that the British coalfield will soon consist of a rump of four or five pits. We must do better than that.

I say quite simply to UK Coal that it must change its attitude and the way that it works, because the issue is not just about the company but the future energy policy of this country. The company faces real difficulties: its own accounts showed a loss of £38 million in the deep-coal sector last year. Output slumped to £12 million. Production costs rose and there was a loss of £3.15 for every tonne of coal produced.

In that context, I am very pleased that the company has cut its dividends: it must be right that shareholders take some of the pain. I am pleased that, at last, it has a chief executive who comes from a mining background, and that it is going to renegotiate coal contracts. The price of coal is going up, but UK Coal is still dependent on contracts that were negotiated at a lower price two years ago. It needs to demonstrate that it will invest in the industry. The company tells me that it will invest £150 million between 2004 and 2006. There is a commitment across the company, particularly from the work force, to get those costs down. So, we have a committed work force and a committed Government, so we must now see real, substantial commitment from UK Coal.

Looking at the company's accounts, its cash flow—£400 million of it—comes from the deep-coal industry. In reality, only £4 million currently comes from property transactions. However, there is a view that it is a property company so it must change its image and show commitment.

The company must change its image because as other hon. Members, particularly my right hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North, have said, we face an energy crisis: perhaps not this year or next year, but there are real problems on the horizon. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will remind us when we shall see the third annual review of the energy White Paper: it is due now. Perhaps he will give us a commitment, as was angled for earlier in the debate, that after the election—whenever it comes—we shall reconsider energy policy and make coal a centrepiece.

I am concerned that our renewables targets are, quite frankly, ambitious. I think that we shall achieve 10 per cent.—not by 2010, but we shall get there. However, 20 per cent. by 2020 is really challenging. I note that the nuclear energy industry is going to run down. Whatever we say, there is currently no sign of any private sector investment coming in. We shall need that in the future. However, the most significant point has already been raised. Do we really want, by 2020, 70 per cent. of our electricity to be generated from gas, 90 per cent. of which will be imported? That would be a crazy situation to work ourselves into.

There will be a place for coal, and I hope that it will be British coal, produced by the most efficient miners in Europe. We must burn that coal cleanly, and invest in new clean coal technology. It hurts me enormously that Japan, which has no indigenous coal industry, spends more on clean coal research than we do in the UK. We can get the economics right and have an energy policy, but we must also protect the environment. That means that the way forward is Government stakeholding in investment in clean coal technology.

It has been a good, powerful debate, and I hope that we shall return to the subject as a Labour Government later this year, and come forward with new, better, and more thoughtful plans for a policy for the 21st century that has coal as its centrepiece.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind hon. Members that the contributions from those on the Front Bench must start not later than 10.30.

10.18 am

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): I should like to thank my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and E-Commerce and the previous Minister for their help in keeping Welbeck and Harworth collieries working in my constituency, although at Welbeck, it is at a price. It might be all right for those on the surface to favour 12-hour days underground, but those who work underground are not too keen on it, so my constituents and others are paying a large price to keep coal at Welbeck.

I met a gentleman not that long ago who sat down with me here and told me that he saw the future of his country based in particular on its coal reserves. I have heard the case for coal put before, from politicians and union leaders in the industry, in my area and across the country over the years. That gentleman was rather different: he is the chief executive of Bechtel, the largest contractor working in Iraq, securing oilfields, and one of the largest nuclear companies in the world. It came as a bit of a surprise to hear him so enthusiastic about coal, so I asked him why he was. He gave two reasons: first, as has already been outlined—so I will not repeat it—he mentioned the security of supply in the long term, which is as obvious in this country as it is in the US.

It is the second reason, however, that I want to put on the agenda today, because it has not been raised. It relates not to the future of electricity supply, but to the future of the car. Hidden in Kerry's manifesto, and other manifestos in the US—and now adopted in the gas-guzzling car state of California by Schwarzenegger—is an attempt to become non-reliant on oil for the future of the car. In that context, Bechtel sees coal gasification as a fundamental part of future car energy consumption and energy requirements. That is in addition to electricity supply. We should not miss out on that. The other country that is considering it is China, which is probably already the largest producer of cars in the world—or it will be, if not next week, then next month. To be reliant on oil for the future of the car does not give it a very long future according to anyone's horizons.

I hope that we will see a delegation in the near future, before decisions are made on the future of nuclear. It should consist of MPs and unions going to see what is being done in the US in relation to coal gasification, how it is being done, the consequences and the economics of it and the investment and Government decisions required. I can suggest a potential sponsor of such a delegation: one of the solicitors—perhaps Thompsons—that have had a good deal out of the Government in terms of the coal health claims. They would probably feel it appropriate to contribute to the debate on the future of the coal industry. The timing will be everything because of the imminence of decisions on nuclear.

I want to make an important side point. The chairman of the finance and economic committee in China stated last week that China is now a net importer of coal and is desperate to import clean coal technology. Why are we not continuing to develop that clean coal technology here in a practical, everyday way and then export it to the Chinese? Shanghai is holding the Expo 2010, which is one of the biggest world trade fairs that there will ever be. That could be a centrepiece of what we are saying to the Chinese: we will help them by selling them our technology to help their environment at the same time as development takes place.

I have two final points. First, we know what the problem is. If someone nobbles people at EDF Energy in my constituency, they are pleased to explain, in reality, in a roundabout way, what the problem is: people in UK Coal have been selling coal too cheaply for too long. The electricity suppliers are laughing all the way to the bank with the contracts that they have got. That started with Budge's mentality and how he viewed the pricing of the commodity, but UK Coal has continued that. If it was selling the commodity at the right price, in terms of the current contract, it would have plenty of profits pouring in. But that one mistake is threatening the future of the industry.

Secondly, if we are returned as hon. Members in a few months' time, we will be expected to vote through an expansion and renewal of nuclear policy. There are a lot of people on the Labour Benches who will see the price of supporting nuclear as a clear guarantee from the Government that there is a future for the coal industry.

10.23 am

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): It is a privilege to make a brief contribution to this debate, which was introduced with such passion by my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy). That passion has been reflected throughout the debate, but we have also had a lot of thoughtful analysis.

I want to make three brief points. First, I want to make a suggestion to the Minister about the role of the Coal Authority. There is widespread fear across coalfields that we must get value for money from the investment aid, which is a large amount of money—nearly £60 million. It would be good to have an enhanced role for the Coal Authority—first, in managing that investment aid and approving any further tranches—rather than leaving things to one or two officials in the Department of Trade and Industry who might not have the same expertise or the same day-to-day contact as the Coal Authority. After all, the Coal Authority is basically the regulator that licenses the mines. In terms of ensuring that UK Coal fulfils its promises on investment, an enhanced role for the Coal Authority would be good. That role would be better sitting with the Coal Authority than as an adjunct to the Department of Trade and Industry's work.

[Mr. John Grogan]

Many hon. Members have mentioned the post-electoral situation, and I hope that I will still be in a position to discuss that after the election. The Government have never been short of five and 10-year plans across a range of policy initiatives. In fact, probably only in the heyday of the Soviet Union were there so many five and 10-year plans. I am not knocking that—it is a jolly good idea. A five-year plan—at least—for coal would give some certainty. As one crisis has followed another over the past seven or eight years, many of my hon. Friends and I have beat our way to ministerial doors, which have always been open to us. Often we have seen the Prime Minister—on perhaps half a dozen occasions. We have had operating aid and investment aid, but it would be good to give a little more certainty to the industry over a five-year period about what is likely to happen in terms of aid.

It would be remiss of me not to mention, briefly, the situation at Kellingley and Selby, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck. It is worth putting on the record, in relation to Selby, the tremendous efforts of DTI officials, and, more importantly, of ordinary miners and many representatives of local bodies, who got stuck into the Selby taskforce. As he said, I and many people in the coalfield would have loved Selby to have just a few more years, but, regardless of that, it is worth recording the tremendous efforts that people made. Many members of the National Union of Miners were involved. Only about 50 miners, out of 1,600, are on the dole. That did not happen by accident; it happened because a lot of training took place. Every man was entitled to time off for a day's training each week, on full pay. Over two years, that made a real difference.

What happens at Kellingley will be a real test, and the situation is under review. Nearly 700 men are employed there. The NUM is negotiating for no compulsory redundancies. Certainly, Kellingley should have a bright future. It has proven reserves of 24 million tonnes, and its output this year is about 1.5 million tonnes, but there are plans to increase that over the coming years. The future of Kellingley is a litmus test for the future of the coal industry. I hope that the negotiations and discussions will be successful and will give the mine a future.

Finally, I want to reflect on clean coal technology, which has come up time and again in debates over the past seven or eight years. It is useful to look back at the various papers, some of which predate the time when my right hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) was Minister. I was reading a summary of energy paper 67, a Government paper from 1999, only last night. It stated that Government support for the demonstration of clean coal technology

"is not perceived to constitute value for money in a country with surplus coal-fired capacity that is moderately efficient. However, the Foresight Task Force has identified a case for demonstration after about 2005, and the Government will re-examine the position in about three years time."

That re-examination was in 2002. We are now, happily, in 2005. It is make-our-minds-up time. Are we just going to continue with the research? As various hon. Members have pointed out, if that is all we do, we will never be credible in terms of selling technology to other markets, such as China. Kellingley was one possible demonstration plant and Hatfield another. In the third term of a Labour Government, it is surely time to get that demonstration plant up and running, given, for example, the resources that are going into wind energy and other forms of renewable energy.

10.29 am

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy) on bringing this subject before us. He has shown great passion and knowledge, as have other contributors. I bring the apologies of my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) who would dearly have liked to be here. Many of his constituents are workers at the Ellington colliery. Unfortunately, he has other parliamentary business.

The debate gives us a welcome opportunity to consider a much wider range of issues than simply the closure of Ellington. I hope that the Minister will respond to the specific criticisms raised by the hon. Member for Wansbeck about UK Coal and its approach to the closure of Ellington, the loss of the 370 jobs and the loss of 1 million tonnes a year of coal capacity.

I would like to discuss some wider issues that have also been raised. When I did my GCEs, which was a number of years ago, I scored full marks for knowing that the UK's coal production capacity was 200 million tonnes; last year, I think that it was down to 28 million tonnes. The change in the coal industry, which has been referred to, has been very dramatic and painful, particularly for the communities directly affected. Almost half the coal produced comes from open-cast production rather than from deep-mine production. That, too, is a tremendous change in the balance of the coal industry. We must remember that consumption now runs at more than twice production. So, instead of being net exporters of coal, we are importers; the figure was about 34 million tonnes last year.

That is in a context where the price for coal internationally, although it has fluctuated, is now back towards being at an historic high, and consumption is rising at the international level, too. There has been about a 19 or 20 per cent. increase in coal consumption over the last decade worldwide. Some figure show that last year was the first year in which the north American zone became a net importer of coal. It is not just China and the UK that are importing, but north America. There is every sign that there will be continued growth in worldwide consumption in years to come.

Given that context, the Minister must consider how far he is prepared to allow the UK coal production industry to shrink and whether he is satisfied with both the current situation and the one that appears to be unfolding. He may be able to respond to some questions about what future he foresees for maintaining our deep-pit work force and expertise in the UK and the mining equipment industry. Specifically, what future does he foresee for clean coal technology?

A number of speakers have pointed out that it has been frustratingly slow work to reach the point of having an effective pilot plant that demonstrates technology that would be exportable. Yet, we have heard, even in this debate, plenty of evidence that across the world, with coal production growing and increasing pressure to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, there is an increasing need for clean coal technology to be widely available at an economic price. The opportunities for the UK to provide such technology are growing.

The hon. Member for Wansbeck made the case, and I would certainly support it, that the idea that coal is dead as an energy source worldwide—or, indeed, as far as the UK is concerned—is wrong. We must concentrate on ensuring that coal's use is less damaging to the environment nationally and internationally. The idea that we are simply dealing with a declining, closing industry and that it is a matter of washing it up as neatly and cleanly as we can is mistaken. We must have a long-term perspective on where we are going next.

I am not sure that the hon. Member for Wansbeck and the right hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) did their cases much good by attacking gas. The UK will be quite dependent on gas for a long time into the future. I do not think that anybody would really regard Norway as deeply unstable or, for that matter, subject to earthquakes. We must have some sense of perspective about what the alternatives are. There is no doubt that, for the foreseeable future, coal will form part of both our energy mix and the international one.

Mr. Wilson: Is Liberal policy committed to an energy policy based on 70 per cent. of Britain's electricity coming from gas and 90 per cent. of that gas being imported? That is clearly the spirit of the hon. Gentleman's comments. He may be right, but it would be interesting to know if that is the policy.

Mr. Stunell: One does not have a policy. One sets a direction in which policy goes. We have made it clear what we think the balance should be between renewables, gas and other sources of power generation. Indeed, when the right hon. Gentleman was a Minister, he and I debated this matter on a number of occasions and I have previously recommended that he read the book that we have produced on the topic.

Broadly speaking, I agree with what the right hon. Gentleman said today. I hope that the Minister will take time to respond to the powerful case made by the hon. Member for Wansbeck about the behaviour of UK Coal and the specifics of that situation. I also want to hear the Minister's answers about the Government's response to the balance between UK production and imported coal over the coming years.

The right hon. Member for Cunninghame, North just challenged me to say what I think about 90 per cent. of gas being imported. Does the Minister believe that it would be acceptable to have 90 per cent. of coal imported? Where does he want that balance to be struck? Where does he see the balance between deep-mine production and open-cast production in the UK in five or 10 years' time, bearing in mind representations that I have received from UK Coal about the difficulties of maintaining production of open-cast coal, never mind that of deep-mined coal? He will know that I have asked him some parliamentary questions on that topic in recent months.

When and how do the Government intend to ensure that clean coal technology forms a significant part of the research and development process in this country, so that we have a product that we can both use and export across the world?

The hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) raised the point about the timing of the third annual review of the White Paper. Perhaps that review could encapsulate some of the answers that Members are seeking today about the coal industry and the future energy mix.

This has been an extremely interesting debate. It has perhaps been overdue. It has raised a number of big questions that are often kept out of the mainstream debate about energy. I hope very much that the Minister can respond fully and take these matters forward.

10.37 am

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy) on securing this debate. As the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) said, it is a timely one, because we stand at a crossroads in terms of energy supplies.

From the research I have had done, the world will, according to the International Energy Agency, need almost 60 per cent. more energy in 2030 than it does now. The hon. Member for Wansbeck, and, indeed other right hon. and hon. Members, have explained why that is the case. China and India, which I think contain about a third of the world's population, are expanding at a rapid rate of knots and will create an energy need. Much as I would like to think it were the case, it is rather ambitious to expect that energy saving will counter the growing demand. The world will require far more energy. That is the case at a time when our coal industry is under environmental pressures. They largely result from directives from the European Union, but they also come partly from Kyoto and from the fact that we take a very responsible attitude to climate change.

The coal industry is under environmental pressure, and our nuclear industry is in question, because although it currently provides about 22 per cent. of our electricity, that will be reduced to 2 per cent. in only 20 years' time. Given the nature of the nuclear industry, if we do not start planning now for life extensions or for new build, it will die. There is no question about that. We are in danger of losing scientists to companies abroad, because a number of new nuclear reactors are being built worldwide—or there are plans to build them. I think that 23 countries are planning to expand their civil nuclear capabilities. We are in danger of losing scientists to the rest of the world. On 6 May, the next Government, regardless of which party wins the election, will have to look carefully at the future of the nuclear industry.

[Mr. Laurence Robertson]

Our country's gas supplies are starting to decline. I do not want to be alarmist, but we will probably become net importers of gas next year, or, maybe, the year after that. We last discussed energy in this Chamber on 19 January. That debate focused on the future of gas, and the Minister was extremely candid, for which I pay tribute to him. He said that if there is high demand for gas in the coming winter or the winter after that, our gas supplies could be rather tight. I do not particularly blame the Minister, but that that is the case is a disgrace in a country with an economy as large as ours, because we do not need to be in that situation. We must give a lot of thought to our energy policy.

I entirely agree with the comments of a number of Members, including the right hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), about the need for a balanced energy supply in future. I say with some trepidation that one reason is that we have in the past been over-reliant on a single primary source of energy; the coal industry had too much control over our energy supplies. I say that as someone whose father was a miner, and I am unreservedly sorry that things have worked out as they have for the coal industry, but it is important that we learn lessons from the past, and I do not want our country to be over-reliant again on any one source of energy. The way things are going, with environmental challenges to our coal industry, our country's dwindling gas supplies and the possible withering of our nuclear industry, we could find ourselves in the situation described by the right hon. Gentleman, with gas supplying 70 per cent. or more of our electricity production and a large proportion of it being imported.

As the hon. Member for Hazel Grove said, there is nothing wrong with importing gas from Norway, and the negotiations for securing its gas supplies are at an advanced stage, but Norway will supply only a small part of our future gas import needs. Gas will have to come from further afield. It is possible that the gas supply that we get from Russia or Qatar, or one or two other places, such as Algeria, might not be interrupted because of political instability in those countries or terrorist activity, and I sincerely hope that that is the case. However, if I were energy Minister and we were over-dependent on gas supplies from certain areas of the world, I would not be too confident that I could guarantee to the people of this country that the lights would not go out. Such supplies might never be interrupted, but the Government have to be realistic. We must provide greater assurances. We should not depend too much on any single source of energy when it comes from such countries and from far away.

If our country and the world in general were to become too dependent on gas, there would also be an economic danger. We could well see the development of a gas equivalent of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries, and I would not want to speculate about what effect that might have on the price of gas. We must bear that in mind.

That brings us back to the question of what our country's policies should be. There must be a debate on the future of the nuclear industry. I pay tribute to those Labour Members who are being open and honest about their views on that. It was a tragedy in the past that the Conservative party was seen as anti-coal and the Labour party as pro-coal, and that the Labour party was seen as anti-nuclear and the Conservative party as pro-nuclear. I hope that we can consign such divisions to history, as they are not helpful. The provision of energy supplies should not be a party political issue, and I pay tribute to those Members of all parties who say that we need a clear policy on new build and on the life extension of existing nuclear plants.

What about the rest of our policy? There are opportunities at least to preserve what is left of our coal industry. When we talk about that industry, we should divide it into two sections: the mining industry and the generation of electricity from coal, because they are slightly different things. As the hon. Member for Hazel Grove said, we import more than 50 per cent. of the coal that we burn. There are good reasons for that; it is low in sulphur content, which helps us meet our environmental requirements. However, we must look to the future and explore possibilities for providing clean coal technology. I hope that we can achieve that, although it is not entirely clear how we can do so without writing cheques for massive sums, and I am not going to say that the Government should write cheques for sums that are too large for any section of the industry.

The creation of a free market in energy has led to a fall in energy prices. Paradoxically, that has created a problem in attracting investment, which we must address. I hope that we can move towards clean coal technology at least as quickly as the Government have tried to move towards wind power. That industry has been given £117 million to develop offshore wind farms, the supply of energy from which will be intermittent and unreliable.

The great thing about coal is that it has been a very good back-stop—I do not want that to sound derogatory. The nuclear industry is a base load supplier of electricity, but coal is far more flexible, and it has provided a very cheap source of electricity. If I were to look ahead and see the continuing decline of the coal industry, I would be sad. I accept that we have to address our environmental challenges, but I would be unhappy if the coal industry were to decline in the way that it has done. Members have quoted figures on that, and I will not repeat them, but it was only 1990 when coal provided about 66 per cent. of our electricity generation, and the figure has fallen to below 30 per cent. I think that it has fallen recently for the reasons that we have given, but the Minister will correct my figures if they are wrong. It is obvious that the trend is downward, regardless of whether the correct current figure is 28 per cent. or 32 per cent. We must question whether we want to allow that trend to continue.

I again congratulate the hon. Member for Wansbeck on securing the debate and on introducing it in such a passionate and caring way, and I pay tribute to all Members who have contributed.

10.48 am

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): It is a pleasure to respond to this debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy) on securing it, and I thank all the Members who have participated. There have been some excellent contributions. My right hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) is well known for his deep commitment to the debate on energy. My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) has a deep knowledge of the mining industry. My hon. Friends the Members for Midlothian (David Hamilton), for Selby (Mr. Grogan), and for Bassetlaw (John Mann) have all lobbied me and made sure that coal industry issues are at the forefront of the Government's considerations; in some cases, they have been to see the Prime Minister to raise particular issues.

The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) made an interesting contribution and set out his case very well. As he comes from the Conservative party, which destroyed the mining industry, he speaks with limited credibility. However, he made some comments to which I should draw attention. One was about the gas supply—yes, it has been tight this year; we became a net importer in December. Although the figures will vary from month to month during the coming year, it is likely that we will in future import more gas than we export. In terms of overall energy, the situation may change during the course of next year, because we are still exporting oil.

The hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) spoke for the Liberal Democrats, who have the valiant record of having done nothing for the coal industry for a very long time. His admission that the Liberal Democrats have not a policy, but a direction, was fascinating. I should be interested to read the book on the direction that they propose, given that they do not have a policy. I am not entirely sure about the distinction, but it was interesting none the less to hear of it.

Mr. Stunell: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. O'Brien: I will, if the hon. Gentleman really must intervene, although there is limited time.

Mr. Stunell: I shall give the Minister a copy of the book when he leaves the Chamber.

Mr. O'Brien: That is very kind. I shall read it with the deep interest with which I read all Liberal Democrat party documents.

I share the belief of my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck in the continuing importance of the coal industry. It is essential that we maintain a coal industry. The Government's view is that it is enormously important to our energy future, and I want that industry to have a long-term future. Of course, I might well say that, given that there is a profitable, good, deep mine in my constituency. When I was first selected for Parliament, there were four mines there, but under a previous Government, three went: my area knew the impact of the closure of those pits.

Last night, I was at a meeting in a mining area in my constituency. The adjoining village lost its pit, and there was a devastating impact on the local community. Many relationships were fractured in Keresley End, where Coventry colliery closed, and we have seen problems with drugs and all sorts of social difficulties. Therefore, the damage done when pits such as Ellington close, and with what has happened in Selby, seems to be a lot better than what happened in my constituency. I not only feel, but understand the problems faced by mining communities when pits close.

Our energy future must come from the security established by diversity of supply. That diversity will guarantee our long-term future and it must come from gas, oil, nuclear sources, wind power, solar power, hydrogen power, but also—importantly—the coal industry. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North said, China, the United States and other countries are ensuring that they develop their coal industries for the future. We need to be sure that we do that in this country, too. Carbon sequestration and clean coal technology are the key. I shall come back to those issues in the next few minutes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck raised Ellington colliery and the 370 jobs being lost there. The Prime Minister met MPs to discuss that, and so did I. I also met Gerry Spindler, the chief executive of UK Coal, and asked him to allow the pumping of the pit to establish whether it could be saved. Gerry Spindler and UK Coal took the view that they would not do that. The Prime Minister made the same request, but the industry is privatised and companies can make their own judgments on such matters, as UK Coal did.

If the pit had been pumped, the mines inspectorate could have looked at it, decided on the level of risk and made an informed judgment about the risk of reopening it. UK Coal did not want to carry out that pumping operation, nor give that opportunity to the mines inspectorate. Clearly, the company would have to take responsibility for miners' safety if it wanted to reopen a pit. Our view was that a report from a mines inspector on the level of risk in the pit would have been helpful to some extent in determining the judgment. UK Coal did not share that view.

Mr. Denis Murphy: I have never doubted the Minister's commitment to the coal industry, nor his role in trying to secure a future for Ellington colliery. However, the industry has reached a critical point. Each individual colliery left is a stand-alone unit. What prevents UK Coal from continuing to close the industry down, knocking mines over like a pack of dominoes? That is the very reason for this debate.

Mr. O'Brien: UK Coal has given us reassurances that it plans to invest in the region of £150 million in the coal industry between 2004 and 2007. The Government, too, are investing substantial amounts in coal aid for the industry, and we plan to continue to do so. Coal investment aid to the tune of £57.5 million has already been allocated, and there is more money in the kitty; it is a limited amount at the moment, but there will be ongoing discussions with the Treasury about the future of that investment.

My hon. Friend referred to what looks like an e-mail that he received, which states:

"Mr. O'Brien said that under current working practices, he would find it difficult to go to the Treasury to ask for more money."

[Mr. O'Brien]

That—to use a word that I understand Mr. Speaker has allowed in the House—is crap. I did not say such a thing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister might rephrase that.

Mr. O'Brien: Very well, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That allegation is unfounded. There was some discussion about working practices in particular pits, and I made it clear that that was a matter for negotiation between the trade union and the employers, not one for me to raise in that way.

The Government intend to continue to support the coal industry. We want pits to develop in future. As we have discussed, there were reviews of Welbeck and Harworth. Following discussions between the unions and management, the industry has begun to address some of those issues, and some pits have been able to remain open. We want such pits to have a long-term future. Coal investment aid is important, and we want to ensure that it can continue.

As far as the industry is concerned, we are committed to investing in the long term through developing research into carbon sequestration and clean coal technology. We are already putting substantial funding into that. If we can continue to develop such technologies, we believe that they will provide the sort of carbon-free, long-term future that the coal industry wants.

We want the coal industry to continue to provide a substantial amount of our electricity needs. Coal-fired power stations are better able to respond more rapidly—certainly more rapidly than gas-fired plants—to fluctuations in electricity demand. We need to ensure that we keep that capacity.

There are only seconds left; so I shall conclude by reaffirming that the Government firmly believe that there should be a continuing role for coal as part of a varied and balanced energy mix. They are working to ensure that the UK coal industry is given appropriate support to maintain access to reserves and to protect—indeed, create—mining jobs at viable mines in the future.

Planning (Hillingdon)

10.59 am

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): By way of introduction, I should say that Adjournment debates are meant to enable individual MPs and others to outline an issue and permit time for ministerial response. I accept that today's debate may be somewhat different. The complexity of the issues involved requires me to spend some time outlining and explaining them. This is an ongoing matter—a work in progress—so the Minister will be able to say only a limited amount this morning. Instead, I suggest that she takes note of the issues, and responds more fully in separate meetings, in writing and possibly in a further debate later in the year.

Despite such facts, I believe that it was my duty to obtain this debate to place on record the matters that have so concerned me, my constituents and local councillors, so that everybody can have access to the fullest information on this important issue. I also wish to ensure that the House has a progress report on a matter that raises questions of public administration, practices and probity that go well beyond local interest and to the heart of administrative accountability in local and national Government.

I wish to explain briefly the background to the debate and the Audit Commission's inquiry into planning services in Hillingdon, to examine the conduct of that inquiry and discuss its findings, and to outline some concerns about the reaction to it from the ruling Conservative administration in the London borough of Hillingdon and from chief officers at the borough. I want also to explain the way forward that I propose should be taken to address the continuing concerns of local residents, councillors and me.

To explain the background to today's debate, in 2002, the Government introduced a planning delivery grant system to improve the performance of local planning departments. An additional grant was awarded to planning authorities as an incentive if they met Government targets for turnaround time from the receipt of a planning application to the date of the dispatch of the decision to the planning applicant. The proposal was generally supported across the House, and both the Government and Opposition parties felt that that was a way to improve overall performance centrally and ensure an accurate record of how that performance changed over time.

The London borough of Hillingdon, in which my constituency is located, received a planning delivery grant in 2002 in reward for its significant improvement in planning performance. Given the widespread local criticism of the performance of Hillingdon's planning departments over the years, that came as a surprise—to say the least—to some local councillors, and residents, and also to me, based on anecdotal evidence from my constituency surgery and consultations with local community organisations and constituents. The Audit Commission designated Hillingdon's planning department as scoring the lowest possible measure for performance and, overall, the authority has been consistently scored as weak.

The contradictory information provoked one local councillor, Councillor Janet Duncan, who is in the Public Gallery today and is a retired assistant director of planning, to delve more deeply into detail of the planning department's records in order to understand why there should be such a discrepancy between local perceptions of the planning department's performance and the high standards claimed by Hillingdon council's planning department as part of its submission for a planning delivery grant.

Councillor Duncan's attempt to inquire into the matter, remarkably, met intense hostility and even abuse at meetings from leading councillors in the Conservative administration. The council is hung, with a Conservative administration supported by the Liberal Democrats. There was and continues to be a disgraceful campaign of personal vilification against Councillor Duncan, led by leading members of the council: the leader of the council and the lead cabinet member for planning. It was even apparent in our local newspaper over the past few weeks.

In addition to the campaign at council level, Councillor Duncan was denied access to information by officers, refused attendance at key meetings with officials to discuss her concerns and faced with a concerted campaign of obfuscation and delay on access to information. To her credit, she persisted and, with great skill, she discovered the following points.

First, the council had claimed performance target achievements, and therefore Government grant awards, based on the use of a target date contrary to the guidelines and regulations set out by the Government. The claim was based on the date that the decision was made, rather than when it was dispatched to the applicant. Secondly, an internal memorandum showed that the use of the incorrect target date, contrary to the Government's requirements, was known to the management team of the council's planning department. That memorandum was also copied to the head of planning services. Thirdly, planning reports had been physically altered, often very crudely, to change the dates, enabling targets to be met and grants to be gained. Fourthly, the staff were aware of the problems and were so concerned that they had raised them at their union meeting.

Our impression of the planning department during that period is of a department permeated by a climate of fear, intimidation and bullying, particularly of junior staff. In my view, that prevented whistleblowers from coming forward. Indeed, no whistleblowing procedures were put in place in the local authority.

I want to explain the level of involvement of Members and Ministers. Once Councillor Duncan's inquiries revealed evidence of potential malpractice, she approached me and, in autumn 2003, I lodged the information with the relevant Minister in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister for Housing and Planning. The Minister rightly took the matter seriously—I commend him for that—and tried professionally and expeditiously to address it in the way that he thought most appropriate. He therefore passed the information to the Audit Commission, which was asked to undertake an urgent investigation.

The Minister had already appointed consultants on two occasions to try to examine the performance of the London borough of Hillingdon and to improve its planning department's procedures and performance overall. By June 2004, I was increasingly concerned at the lack of progress in the pursuit of the Audit Commission's investigation undertaken by the local district auditor. Neither I nor Councillor Duncan had heard anything or received any report on the activities of the district auditor.

Consequently, I secured an Adjournment debate on 9 June 2004, in which I outlined the concerns and questioned the Minister on the progress of the district auditor's inquiry. I raised further concerns that evidence, particularly computer-based evidence, was at risk and being destroyed. I expressed my worries about the appropriateness of the district auditor's inquiries and, I have to say without any form of arrogance, it seems almost prophetic that I questioned whether the district auditor would have the skills and abilities to investigate such matters and bring such an investigation to a conclusion. I suggested that a more independent investigation might be required, certainly into the administration of the department, and that the police should be involved.

On 8 July 2004, when I was led to understand that the district auditor had drawn his investigation to a conclusion and was drafting his final report, I raised in business questions my anxiety that the district auditor had not approached me or Councillor Duncan for interview, nor even the full range of council officers involved in the process. Indeed, my understanding was that no local residents who had raised their concerns had been interviewed. As a result, the district auditor did not complete his report, but eventually wrote to Councillor Duncan and me and agreed a meeting at which we were at long last able to directly explain our concerns and hand over further evidence.

I now turn to the district auditor's report, which was eventually submitted to the borough on 31 January 2005, more than 12 months and leading on for 14 since I raised the matter with the Minister, who had properly and in a timely manner submitted the evidence to the district auditor. Although the chief executive of the London borough of Hillingdon had given an assurance to the district auditor that the report would be published on an open cabinet agenda, the report was withheld from the first cabinet meeting after publication and withheld from the Labour group councillors and the public for more than 10 days. In the meantime, the local press were briefed. They were told that the district auditor had given the council a clean bill of health, the investigation had found only minor administrative failures and that no one apart from a few junior officers was to blame. That was pure spin, distortion and, in many instances, a downright lie.

What is the reality of the report? Far from giving the council a clean bill of health, the district auditors confirmed the facts. They confirmed the facts exposed by Councillor Janet Duncan's own investigations.

First, did the council misreport its development control performance by reference to the wrong date, contrary to Government procedures? Yes. I shall quote directly from the district auditor:

> "The council has misreported its development control performance over a number of years by reference to the date of decision, rather than the date of despatch of decision."

We discover from the brief sampling—not the full investigation—that more than one in 10 planning applications were using the wrong system, contrary to Government guidelines that were known and issued at the time.

[John McDonnell]

Secondly, did that misreporting have an effect on the council's overall performance records? Yes it did. It had a significant impact on the actual performance achieved by the council. Again, I shall quote the district auditor:

"Indeed, it is a far more significant matter, in terms of its impact on reported performance, than any of the matters originally referred to us."

The facts of the matter are extraordinary.

Thirdly, did the council receive grant from the Government based on misreported performance? Yes. Let me refer to the auditor again:

"The Council received £320,000 planning delivery grant for 2003/2004 from the ODPM, in part reflecting improvements to its development control performance that had been calculated to the date of decision, rather than the date of despatch of decision."

Thanks to the beneficence of this Government, and I am grateful to the Ministers involved, they have not demanded that that grant be paid back. Otherwise, my constituents would have had to pay for that through their local council taxes—paying for the abuse of the system by the council itself and council officers.

Fourthly, were reports tampered with and dates on reports changed? Yes. In more than one in six planning application reports, the district auditor discovered and confirmed that reports had been "manually adjusted". That is the district auditor's euphemism for tampering, crossing out, backdating crudely and overriding dates—in many ways what in common parlance would be described as forgery.

The district auditor determined from a limited sample that in more than one in 25 of those cases the detailed application processing papers were regarded as definitely suspicious. That is a district auditor who I believe has erred on the side of caution and in favour of the local authority, but even in those figures he identified real suspicions.

Fifthly, were senior officers in the planning department aware that the date of decision and not dispatch was being used contrary to Government guidelines? Yes. The e-mail from the planning department's management team was produced confirming that. From the district auditor's report one would expect that, having found all the major factual allegations correct and proven, he would conclude that it was a serious matter warranting action, and that it would behove him to ensure further independent investigation was enabled and promptly undertaken. From my experience in local government, I would expect the district auditor to see the matter through from investigation to report to full independent investigation and implementation of a view of improvements in procedures. Otherwise, how can my constituents gain or regain any confidence in the administration of the planning process in my area?

Bizarrely, the district auditor, having found out the facts of the matter, stops. It is as though he withdraws from the role as the engine of further investigation and reform. He also draws some extraordinary conclusions that no reasonable person could possibly arrive at.

First, I shall review his investigation process. From the outset, I was concerned about the lack of skills and competence of the district auditor to pursue the matter. That was exacerbated when we found out that the inquiry was to be ended early without myself or Councillor Duncan being interviewed. However, I now discover that the auditor definitely did not interview all relevant staff, particularly those staff with their names attached to planning reports, and particularly junior staff. In addition he did not even bother to interview the local resident upon whom we submitted an affidavit confirming that he had discovered that the date of his planning application had been tampered with and had reported it to the head of planning services at Hillingdon.

The district auditor, we now discover, had not implemented any whistleblowing procedures to enable vulnerable staff or planning applicants to produce evidence in confidence and security. Even when it was pointed out that staff had raised their concerns at their union meeting, the district auditor did not even contact the trade union or its representatives to clarify the matter.

Secondly, the district auditor relied heavily on evidence being collected and analysed by the London borough of Hillingdon planning department itself—the very organisation being investigated was providing him with the materials upon which he was to base his conclusions. For example, whereas the council was reporting the percentage of reports using the wrong date as 0.6 per cent., when he checked the department's information and verified it with a small sample, he discovered that it rose to 11.2 per cent. The numbered tampered with rose from the council's claim of 9.9 per cent. to 17.4 per cent. when the district auditor undertook further investigation. The auditor then naively suggested that that was not deliberate but may have been just the result of pressure of work.

I have previously given to the Minister examples where dates have been scrubbed out, rubbed out and new dates crudely inserted above them and signed off by a number of officers. That is not overwork; that is tampering with information upon which legal matters are determined. Even the auditor is critical of how, instead of instigating an independent review, the council had the audacity to appoint the head of planning services to investigate her own planning department. In addition, he criticised the limited scope of those internal investigations.

Thirdly, the final conclusion of the district auditor exposes the inadequacies of that route—that whole mechanism for addressing what I believe to be a deliberate and organised attempt to manipulate the planning system in Hillingdon for the benefit of the ruling council administration and senior officers. Having discovered that the wrong procedures were used, that the council officers had been fully advised of the right dates and procedures, that there had been tampering with and adjustment of official documents and that that was suspicious, he concluded that nobody was to blame. Despite all the evidence of tampering and forgery, no one is to blame, because he cannot find what he describes as conclusive evidence to nail any individual officer or group of individuals. Even the council had to admit in its own investigation that it had been led to believe that the objective of tampering had been to try to gain additional Government grant.

The district auditor seeks to downgrade the matter, saying that no extra grant was achieved. That is not right: extra grant was achieved in the first year and we did not lose it because the Government were good enough not to demand it back. The auditor argues that nobody gained individually. Quite the contrary: senior officers have been complimented on their performance by leading local councillors. No doubt, their careers will be enhanced and they will receive the associated pay rewards that follow.

What next? Is the district auditor to see the matter through to any conclusion? No. He recommends that the council organise an independent investigation into the forged dates and tampering. The leader of the local council responded in our local paper, saying that he and the borough solicitor will undertake that investigation. Where is the independence in that?

The scrutiny committee on the planning environment seeks to set up a sub-committee perhaps to examine the report. It is understood that the leading Conservative administration will seek to block that at the whips committee next week. The district auditor reports that, as a minimum, there should be an investigation into the officers who are responsible for significant manual adjustments—forgeries. To date, not a single member of staff has been disciplined, and I predict that none will be. If anybody is, he will just receive a slap on the wrist and the issue will be allowed to die quietly. That is the Hillingdon way under its present administration.

In conclusion, many in my community feel betrayed by their local council. Now, they feel let down by the district auditor too, believing that the body that is responsible for ensuring probity and efficiency in the delivery of local services has not undertaken its work thoroughly. I will not fail them. Too much evidence of fraudulent behaviour has come to light during the investigation—and that is in addition to the dire failure of planning services in my community. Planning enforcement is almost non-existent; there is no pro-active planning; the staffing levels in the department are poor; and we have planners who go to site meetings without even knowing where the sites are. The disregard of the wishes of local people goes on apace. The selling-off of community assets; the disregard of covenants on individual pieces of land; the distribution of grants and the award of contracts—all have a whiff about them if they are associated with the London borough of Hillingdon.

Today, I am calling for a fully independent public inquiry into the London borough of Hillingdon as a planning authority. I am launching a petition, which I shall urge local residents, businesses and community organisations to sign, calling upon the council to do its duty and to convene an independent inquiry. That will bring the matter back to the attention of the council, the community and, if necessary, Parliament.

If the administration of the London borough of Hillingdon has nothing to hide, why should it refuse to support such a call? If the councillors are so confident of the probity of their administration, I ask them to open up the books. In the London borough of Hillingdon, there is an endemic culture of connivance and a belligerent refusal to be accountable. That has resulted in a grotesque failure to deliver the services that my community needs and deserves. The administration is tainted and contaminated at the highest levels, and it is my role to expose that, in order to ensure that my constituents are better served by their council.

11.22 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) on securing the debate and on using it to raise an issue that he has been pursuing for some time. He set out clearly some of the problems facing Hillingdon and raised many of the problems that were pointed out in the Audit Commission report on Hillingdon. He has been instrumental in pushing forward the district auditor's inquiries in meetings with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning in late January 2003 and early 2004, and promoted the subject in a debate in Westminster Hall last year.

As my hon. Friend knows, the Audit Commission conducted a thorough investigation and concluded that for some years Hillingdon had incorrectly based the reporting of its development control performance on the date of making, rather than the date of issue, of decisions on planning applications. It concluded that that did not appear to have been done deliberately with the motive of enhancing reported performance, although it did have that effect. The Audit Commission's analysis showed that the difference in reported performance in a particular category could affect as many as 50 per cent. of the decisions in that category. It also found some manual amendment of decision dates, which improved performance figures by 2 to 4 per cent. I understand that the council is investigating that further.

John McDonnell: I find it extraordinary that the district auditor's report concluded, without further investigation and on the basis of information provided by the local authority with limited sampling and so on, that nothing was done deliberately. Even within the council, there was one officer who might have ensured some independence within the authority. Its statement says that "there are grounds for suspecting that there were adjustments to the dates certain applications were signed off and this had the intention of having the determination of these cases meeting Government set targets".

and yet there is to be no further investigation of that matter, other than an internal one.

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend makes important points, particularly on the manual amendments. I will come back to that.

As part of its investigation, the Audit Commission sought to verify that the council had put in place procedures to secure proper recording of performance. It identified some errors and indicated that the council has taken steps to prevent their recurrence. The report also enumerates a wide range of checks—

John McDonnell: Let me make this explicit and put it on the record: the council's actions were taken only after Councillor Janet Duncan had raised the matters, not just with the council, but with the Government office for London. When the discussions between the Government office for London and the council took place, she was excluded from the meetings. So only when one councillor undertook a whistleblowing exercise were the matters addressed.

[John McDonnell]

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend will understand that I am not able to comment on the detail of individual councillor's roles or on their participation in particular meetings. The council has certainly instigated changes in response to the Audit Commission report and the problems that it identified.

Our consultants have also indicated that there might still be concerns as to whether the improved performance can be maintained, because they think that the council has not addressed all the issues that might put performance at risk. Senior officials from the ODPM met the council's chief executive in February to put the issue to him, and dialogue is continuing with the borough about what still needs to be done.

John McDonnell: In the past, reports published by the ODPM on the planning performance of the London borough of Hillingdon have been denied to councillors for a considerable number of weeks, if not months. Therefore, there is no transparency in Hillingdon. I urge the ODPM to take a more active role in ensuring that discussions between the Department and the council are made open and transparent, and that all reports are provided to all councillors. That has not been the case until now. In fact, obtaining information from the London borough of Hillingdon at member level is like drawing teeth.

Yvette Cooper: I am keen to ensure that there is appropriate transparency of discussions, so I shall happily discuss the matter further with my hon. Friend to ensure that the right level of transparency is implemented in practice.

It is important that when allegations are made that touch on the propriety of the council's conduct, appropriate investigations are undertaken so that the situation can, as far as possible, be put right. As I said, the council continues to investigate certain aspects of the misreporting. The auditor will also need to see that the authority is taking effective follow-up action, and if the auditor has reason to be concerned that the action is not effective, it is open to the auditor to carry out further inquiries.

My hon. Friend has asked for further investigation into these matters. I am happy to consider his points and to talk to him about them, because he raises important details and issues for consideration.

John McDonnell: The key issue is that the district auditor has specifically recommended that there should be an independent investigation, but that is not being pursued by the local authority. We will not restore confidence in planning in the London borough of Hillingdon until we have an open, transparent and independent public investigation.

Yvette Cooper: I recognise the import of the points raised. Obviously, internal investigations are continuing with the council and the auditor will want to see that the authority is taking effective follow-up action, but I will have further discussions with my hon. Friend.

To reduce the risk of similar problems occurring in future, the ODPM has collaborated with the Audit Commission in preparing new and clearer guidance to auditors about the checks that they should make and the things that they should look out for in auditing the arrangements for recording planning performance. In due course, we will consult on a draft prescribed application form for all local planning authorities. That will make it clear how the beginning and end of the time taken to handle a planning application must be recorded.

11.30 am

Sitting suspended until Two o'clock.

EU Structural Funds (Wales)

2 pm

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): I am delighted to have the opportunity to open this debate and to see the Minister for Trade and Investment in his place. I look forward to his reply. The issue is of great importance to Wales—as well as to one or two other objective 1 areas—and goes to the heart of the Government's regional policy and its future.

I start by referring to the debate and the vote in the House on Monday. The Government proposed that the House note and approve their approach to structural funds at the European level. The motion made it clear that the Government sought to put a ceiling on the EU budget, at 1 per cent. of gross value added—GVA—and bring structural funds from Europe back to the Treasury. That is a perfectly legitimate position—I understand it and I know where the Government are coming from. However, I shall argue against it, because many issues need to be taken account of.

Although I am delighted to see the hon. Members for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) and for St. Ives (Andrew George), I was disappointed that neither the Conservatives nor the Liberal Democrats joined us on Monday by supporting our amendment to the Government's motion. I understand that the Conservatives might have particular concerns about the size of the EU budget, but only a week ago the Liberal Democrats put a motion to the National Assembly for Wales proposing that the Assembly

"believes that Wales's best interests would be served by proactive campaigning by the Welsh Assembly Government to ensure support for the European Commission's structural funds post-2006 proposals".

The Liberal Democrats could not have been more unequivocal in the Assembly, but they certainly can be equivocal here in Westminster, where they sat on the fence and did not vote on Monday.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): The hon. Gentleman will understand that the amendment to the Government's motion also had the effect of putting in jeopardy the British rebate. Because of that, we could not vote for it and abstained.

Mr. Thomas: That is an interesting position and means that the Liberal Democrats could not think up an amendment to take their policy into account.

The hon. Gentleman's point also underlines a problem that I shall address later. How do we tackle the EU budget without facing up to the British rebate? I hope that when the hon. Gentleman has heard what I have to say about what the rebate and structural funds bring to Wales, it might be clearer to him why he should support our position. Indeed, the hon. Member for St. Ives had a debate in the House a few months ago—it was at the end of the day and he had a lot of time, as I remember—when he said positive things about structural funds. One cannot positively campaign for structural funds to be retained by the EU without addressing the implications of that for Government spending, the rebate and so forth.

We have had our say on that, however, so let us look to the future. Let us consider how we can ensure that opportunities for my constituency and west Wales and the valleys continue to flow from EU structural funds. If the Government get their way in their twin-pronged attack on structural funds—they want to limit the budget and repatriate the funds to the Treasury—what undertaking will they give today and in future to ensure that Wales and the objective 1 areas in England do not lose out? I accept that we have heard warm words from the Government, but we have not yet received any such undertakings.

Perhaps the Minister will say, "Trust the Government—we will deliver." Many of us have difficulty trusting the Government these days, over many issues. Many hon. Members, on both sides of the House, have shown that in recent votes. In particular, the Government are not to be trusted on regional policy and they need to underpin their commitment to regional economic policy for several reasons.

The eligibility of Wales for objective 1 funding is not a badge of pride, but a badge of failure—the failure of UK-wide regional policy over many years and by many Governments. Westminster and Whitehall have got us into that state, so some of us have little faith that future Governments will get us out of it.

UK regional policy is appalling. We have the worst regional inequality in the European Union, with the possible exception of the islands of Greece, which, again, is not a badge of pride. There has been a failure to develop any worthwhile regional economic or fiscal measures, such as the ability to vary corporation tax in objective 1 areas or the ability to levy local business taxes, income tax or variations of that. We have still not dealt with the post-industrial legacy of unemployment, long-term sickness and incapacity benefit claimants, which is particularly serious in the south Wales valleys.

With such a history of failure, we have deep suspicions as to whether the Treasury or the Under-Secretary of State for Wales will be able to deliver an equivalent programme of investment over the forthcoming objective 1 period, which we know the Commission is proposing.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has moved on from pre-election froth about the badly worded amendment that was put to the House on Monday. To get to the substance of the issue, would he agree that we are not just talking about suspicions? It is a matter of fact that the Commission would be able to offer objective 1 regions a seven-year programme, plus another two years of funding, which the Government cannot possibly match. That is a fundamental reason why objective 1 regions such as Wales, and Cornwall and the Scilly Isles must campaign for the continuation of the programme.

Mr. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman is right, although of course I do not accept his description of our amendment, which I thought was perfectly respectable for Wales and Cornwall. He is right about forthcoming regional programmes: the objective 1 programme—or the convergence programme, as it is likely to be called—will be a six-year programme. There will also be transitional funding after that, depending on how well the areas receiving the funding do.

[Mr. Thomas]

With the best will in the world, Governments now work only on two or three-year cycles. I appreciate that this Government have moved to a three-year fiscal cycle, but any Government can at most give only an outline commitment for three years.

Andrew George: Or for one Parliament.

Mr. Thomas: Indeed—if there is an election, things change again. It is essential that our communities have direct access to those EU structural funds without having to go through Whitehall—or even, to a certain extent, through the Assembly or whatever. That is why the Cornish convention supports Plaid Cymru's position, and I look forward to hearing what the hon. Gentleman has to say about that.

That argument is also why the Wales TUC opposed the Government's proposals in its submission to their consultation at the end of 2003. The Wales TUC said that Wales needed the long-term investment and that it did not have confidence in the proposed investment policy. It is something for the Wales TUC to say that about a Labour Government.

Let us consider the current legacy. We could be asked, "Why are you making all this fuss?". It might be argued that objective 1 has worked—that west Wales and the valleys have come out of their unfortunate position and are perhaps not even eligible for objective 1 any more. Regrettably, however, that is not the case. On 28 January EUROSTAT published new statistics on GVA per head in the EU regions. West Wales and the valleys continue to be listed among those below the 75 per cent. threshold of eligibility for objective 1, with GDP per head currently estimated at 73.82 per cent. of the EU average—Cornwall is at 70 per cent., as the hon. Gentleman might know. The figure for west Wales and the valleys is 67.35 per cent. of the pre-EU enlargement average, but it is still low enough to qualify for objective 1 funding.

We have the opportunity. If the structural funds continue and the Government are part of that, west Wales and the valleys are poised to take further advantage of objective 1. With a figure of 53 per cent. of the EU average, Anglesey is the worst area, so I am pleased that the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen) is here for this debate—he was not present on Monday. It is vital for Anglesey and constituencies such as mine that we continue objective 1 funding.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising the issue of GDP in parts of Wales, but does he not accept that the figures that he quoted are for the early stages of the programme up to 2002? The recent figures from the Office for National Statistics reveal a considerable increase, showing that objective 1 and major projects are working in areas such as Ynys Môn.

Mr. Thomas: Anglesey has been in decline, it must be said. The figures to which I referred are the latest European statistics from the member states, and the hon. Gentleman must bear it in mind that eligibility for further objective 1 funding is based on those figures, not the most recent ONS figures. He surely does not want to deprive west Wales and the valleys of eligibility for objective 1. I hope that he will now support the fact the Commission is prepared to use the figures that show eligibility and that he will not seek to create an artificial situation that would mean that we would not be eligible.

Albert Owen: Has not the hon. Gentleman's party been putting the argument in the media over the past few days that if we do not act by July, the new figures will, by December, prove exactly what I said—that there has been considerable improvement in the GDP of west Wales and the valleys, including in my constituency?

Mr. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman cannot say that. [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue. If we do not act by July, the UK will take up the EU presidency and will therefore be in a position to dictate the terms. He has to decide whether he is for or against structural funds for Anglesey. If he is for structural funds for Anglesey, he will support the campaign. If he is against them and believes that the Treasury will deliver a similar sum of money, he can by all means line up with the Treasury. However, people in Anglesey know that the structural funds are delivering to them. [Interruption.] If he wants to know about the money delivered to Anglesey and about the jobs created, I can tell him. Some 2,080 jobs have been created in Anglesey by objective 1. Those are the jobs that he wants to put down the pan, by supporting his Government's position on objective 1.

We have heard enough about the matter from the hon. Gentleman, who finds himself on somewhat weak and shaky ground. The choice that I described is the real choice we face.

The Government are leading a campaign in Europe—and will strengthen it after taking up the EU presidency in June—to cut the budget to 1 per cent. of average EU national income. That would mean a severe cut in all policy areas, including in objective 1 areas.

Let us turn from one end of Wales—it was interesting to have the Labour party's Anglesey policy illuminated—to the other, to the south Wales coalfields. A recent report from Sheffield Hallam university, which many hon. Members have no doubt seen and which was published on the 20th anniversary of the end of the coal dispute, found that south Wales continues to suffer most from the lack of jobs that resulted from the closure of the coal industry. Some 20,000 mining jobs went in that period.

I accept that that was not this Government's responsibility, but we need to ask what has been done since to bring those post-industrial areas up to a state of competitiveness, so that they can take advantage of what the Government say they want to come from the Lisbon agenda, for example, and so that the working population can become trained, fit and active.

The story in south Wales is very sad. Out of all the former coal areas, Wales has made the slowest progress out of depression and unemployment towards a more active and vital work force. Only about 22 per cent. of the old coalfield jobs have been replaced, whereas in some areas, such as Yorkshire, the figure is 100 per cent. The Government might say that means that regional policy has worked for Yorkshire. However, one thing is for certain: UK regional policy following the miners' strike and the closure of the pits has not worked for south Wales.

The Sheffield Hallam report also points to around 100,000 former miners who count as the hidden unemployed. They are the people claiming incapacity benefit who come to our surgeries. We know that the Government also have plans for incapacity benefit.

The interesting thing about the report is that Professor Stephen Fothergill of Sheffield Hallam university estimated that it would take a further 10 to 15 years for full economic recovery. Curiously, 10 to 15 years is exactly the time scale of another objective 1 period and another set of transitional funds. The prescription and the analysis have been made and there is a possible solution: continuing to support objective 1 for south Wales.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Thomas: I give way to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David), because I know that he is going to praise the previous Plaid Cymru administration in Caerphilly for the £27 million of objective 1 funding brought into Caerphilly, which he mentioned in The Western Mail this morning.

Mr. David: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman has taken the trouble to read my excellent article in The Western Mail.

Mr. Thomas: I did not say that it was excellent.

Mr. David: I am sure that good sense will be reflected later in his speech.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Professor Stephen Fothergill. In fairness to the professor, he said that his analysis is unsurprising because it has been difficult to attract inward investment into the south Wales valleys because of issues of topography.

Mr. Thomas: I accept that point. I have no problem whatever with that analysis, but, even so, how do we attract inward investment and encourage indigenous start-ups in the valleys when there is such poor infrastructure there?

The hon. Gentleman will know that many of the infrastructure improvements in the valleys, including the railway lines to Caerphilly and from Taffs Well up to Pontypridd and on to my home town of Aberdare, have been made with objective 1 money. Does he want such investment to continue for areas such as Caerphilly, or does he trust a UK Government of whatever political colour, as there is a general election coming up, and we could have change—I am sure that the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk will want to make his pitch for that later—maintaining that for 10 or 15 years? I do not think so.

I should hope that the hon. Member for Caerphilly, as a former MEP, recognises the huge strengths that we can gain from being locked into a European-wide regional policy that has some of the best features of dealing with regional disparity, and some of the best socialist features of delivering aid from the richest areas in Europe to the most deprived. I advocate that policy in the UK and the European Union; it can deliver for Caerphilly and Ceredigion, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support it, because some of the alternatives rely on Government policies such as state aids.

Let us consider what has happened with state aids from the UK. Unfortunately, they have gone down in the UK by 22.5 per cent. It is sad that the latest figures on state aids that I was able to obtain show that they were higher in the period from 1996 to 1998, which was the transition period from a Conservative to a Labour Administration, than under this Administration. State aid in manufacturing, in particular, is way below in the UK, at half the European average. [Interruption.] As my hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) says from a sedentary position, "More Tory than the Tories."

The Government's use of state aid has been extremely slow and has not matched the EU average, which is the equivalent of €534 per person compared to the UK average of €261 per person. We are way behind in regional spending using state aid rules.

What if we follow the Government's policy and it transpires that we are not part of EU structural funds and we renationalise those funds to the Treasury? The new EU Commissioner for Competition, Neelie Kroes, said, when interviewed by the Financial Times on 26 January, that even regions below the 75 per cent. figure, such as Wales and Cornwall, should not be eligible for Government state aid if they are in member states that are not relatively poor.

The Commission seems to be saying, "If structural funds are available, you can make use of them, because you can come straight to us, but if your Government want to stop structural funds being made available, we will carefully scrutinise how state aids are used within your member state." I understand that that is political posturing from the EU Commission, but there is a lesson there for the Government about the price that they may have to pay to get this handbag rebate that they seem to have inherited from Maggie Thatcher and that they seem to think is so crucial.

Let us consider what the EU Commission proposes and what the Government are saying no to. The Commission has a set of proposals for regional cohesion policy from 2007 to 2013, which should start at the beginning of 2007. It proposes to modify objective 1 to highlight its economic convergence aspect in line with the Lisbon agenda, so it may well become known as the convergence objective.

Regions will still be eligible, however, if their GDP per head is less than 75 per cent. of the average for the enlarged EU—I have already pointed out that that still applies to west Wales and the valleys—and is calculated on the figures for the three years prior to adopting the regulation. That brings us back to our earlier point of debate: if we adopt the regulation now, we will have the necessary figures to qualify. I do not want to lose that opportunity because of the Government's delay. Newly published EU statistics show that west Wales and the valleys and Cornwall would be included, but Merseyside and south Yorkshire would not. Those two objective areas would no longer qualify.

Of course, all that is subject to member states' agreement, but the proposals would apply to west Wales and the valleys because the EU proposes that half the cohesion funds should be spent in the EU 15, and half in the new 10 accession countries. Of the half to be spent in EU 15, 78 per cent. would go to the convergence fund. How much that would mean for Wales depends on how many areas in the EU 15 and in the nomenclature of units for territorial statistics—NUTS—proposals come below the 75 per cent. threshold.

[Mr. Thomas]

There are 1.8 million people in the west Wales and the valleys area, and we should expect a continuation of funding of at least £2 billion. If one considers that many areas in the EU 15 will come above the 75 per cent. average, one sees that there is a little less jam to go around, but it does not have to be spread as thinly because there is less area to cover. The opportunities for Wales will still be considerable. Perhaps the Government can even tell us what those opportunities are. Who knows? The Minister may have the figures to say what the EU structural funds would mean for west Wales and the valleys; I would certainly like to hear that the Government at least know what they are going to throw away, because that reflects what they will then have to commit from the Treasury.

We should also remember that such sums must be additional to current Government spending. That is another problem that both the TUC and I want to raise. How can we be sure about the clarity of additionality? It is one thing for the Treasury to say, "We will spend the same as you would have got under objective 1 for the next two or three years," but another altogether for it to follow that through in the spending round in the public expenditure survey, and to ensure that that happens. We know that it is extremely difficult. It is difficult with all Governments; we have to be clear about that, but there is no doubt that there is more clarity with EU structural funds. Did not we in Wales recently have to use the Freedom of Information Act 2000 in relation to what the National Assembly for Wales identified as an additionality need—£451 million per year—and to establish the fact, as we said all along when the Treasury gave an extra £200-odd million as a Barnett-plus formula, that it was not meeting the full additionality?

This is an important opportunity to obtain significant and continuing investment in west Wales and the valleys, to bring in match funding from the private and public sectors, and to ensure that such funding is in addition to current Government spending. However, we must ensure that those opportunities are not preserved in the Treasury model; to use the word "model" is a little extreme, because there is no clarity about where it adds up from.

Albert Owen: The hon. Gentleman talked about additionality and the differential between what the Assembly asked for and what was given in Barnett-plus. Does he agree that no project has suffered, and that there are no shortfalls in any of the priorities in the spending measures that the Assembly uses for funding in west Wales and the valleys? [Interruption.]

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr refers to the film fund for Wales—a particular example—but the bigger picture is more important. The hon. Gentleman says that objective 1 projects have not suffered because of the lack of clarity and additionality, and I agree with him in a sense, but that brings us to the question of where the money came from. It came from other parts of the National Assembly budget. Therefore, we must ask not which objective 1 projects—

Albert Owen: The answer is—

Mr. Thomas: No, no. The answer to the question is that no objective 1 projects suffered, but the Welsh Assembly spending budget suffered, so it was health, education and transport that suffered—[Interruption.] It was not—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Ynys Môn can have this argument across the Chamber all he likes, but perhaps he should seek to catch your eye to make his points more appropriately, Mr. Olner.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): There is a little too much noise coming from sedentary interventions.

Mr. Thomas: Thank you, Mr. Olner. The point that I was trying to make to the hon. Gentleman, although he does not want to listen to it, is that although objective 1 projects may not have suffered, because that money was taken from the National Assembly budget, other projects did suffer. The waiting lists are testament to the lack of long-term investment in the health service in Wales. The hon. Gentleman can chew the cud over that when he gives his speech.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. As far as I am aware, no EU structural funds go to the national health service in Wales, so the hon. Gentleman is straying a fair bit away from the debate.

Mr. Thomas: Thank you, Mr. Olner. My hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr has pointed out how structural funds could be used for investment in the health service in Wales, but I leave that for another day. My point is that the use of additional match funding from elsewhere in the budget meant that there was an effect on public services.

I move to the final aspect of structural funds. We have talked about objective 1, which is obviously of great importance in my constituency and in those of, not all hon. Members present, but one or two at least. The final aspect is the future of agricultural funding affecting Wales. A European agricultural fund for rural development has been proposed as part of the structural funds project and is being discussed in the European Parliament. Following common agricultural policy reform, that is now the major focus of policy reform for funding. It is certainly of great importance to my constituency.

The fund will determine what European funding is available for rural areas from 2007 onwards, so the next decision is important for how that is shaped in Wales and the shape of the programme throughout the UK. The UK has historically received a low allocation; today the House of Lords has produced a report which shows Ireland's allocation of that particular funding shooting up, and the UK lagging well behind. We are told that we will get money from the rebate, and that that will help us if the Government get their way.

Currently, the rebate is about £3.4 billion. We want a commitment from the Government to spend the equivalent of objective 1 in west Wales and the valleys and elsewhere in Wales on these policies. I admit that if they make that commitment, some of my argument dies. We look forward to receiving a commitment, not to spend money, but a commitment in facts and figures that is put into the Treasury forward planning.

The Government will have to consider both objective 1 and European funding. I am particularly concerned about less favoured area status, which affects all our constituencies. Some 80 per cent. of Wales has less favoured area status. The proposal being made—because of a European audit on the fund, which has found some problems in other countries, not the UK—is that socio-economic factors should be taken out of less favoured area status. That would be disastrous for Wales and its farming and rural areas. Although that is not objective 1, it is part of structural funds, and I hope that the Minister will consider that in detail.

I conclude by asking some questions. Will the Government fight to keep less favoured area status for Wales? Will they fight for socio-economic factors to be taken into account so that we can continue to access rural structural funds from Wales on the basis of the impact and support of our farming based on social and economic factors as well as geographic terrain?

Will the Government fight for objective 1 or convergence funds for west Wales and the valleys? That is almost a rhetorical question, because they have already said that they will not do that, in which case what binding guarantees will they now make for ongoing funding that will be transparent and additional to usual Treasury funding for west Wales and the valleys?

What will the Government do to fight for other structural funds in Wales? There is a plethora of other structural funds that I have not mentioned in any detail, which are available under other objectives. If the Government do not seek to make those structural funds available to Wales and seek instead to do that through the UK Treasury, what binding guarantees of ongoing funding will they give?

We find it difficult to accept promises from a Government who have come before Parliament several times with promises in a manifesto and overturned those promises. We are seeking more than mere words here today. We are seeking real, binding commitments to ensure that the most poor areas in the whole of the United Kingdom from Anglesey to Ceredigion down to the south Wales valleys are kept in line for significant regional assistance and aid. Whether it comes from Europe or the UK Treasury, it must be transparent, available and accessible to those communities. That is the purpose of the debate, and that is what I hope Members will support.

2.30 pm

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): May I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) on securing the debate? It is an extremely important issue, which should be considered fairly and honestly, and it is complex, so it must be approached in a reasonable manner. He did so in part, but only in part, I am afraid.

I begin by pointing out where we are at the moment. West Wales and the valleys have objective 1 status, which was secured by the British Government in 1999 at the Berlin summit. West Wales and the valleys receive the largest tranche of European money of any objective 1 area in the United Kingdom: some £1:5 billion. In real terms that is £3.2 billion because there is match funding, partly from central Government through Barnett plus, and also from the voluntary and private sectors.

In contrast to what happened with structural funds under the Conservative Government, it is absolutely clear that all the money available is being drawn down from Brussels and put to good effect. It really is being put to good effect because the latest figures show that some 2,325 projects in west Wales and the valleys are either taking place or about to take place because of that funding.

The hon. Gentleman referred to some EUROSTAT figures that have been submitted and, yes, they are accurate, but the important thing to stress is that they are out of date. They do not illustrate just how well the Welsh economy, and in particular the objective 1 part of it, is doing.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Whether or not what the hon. Gentleman is saying is accurate, does he accept that those figures will be used for determination in July?

Mr. David: I do not think that those figures will be used in determination in July because there is a lot of debate still to be had, and I will come on to that in a moment. The hon. Gentleman is just looking at one set of figures dealing with a particular moment of time.

If we look at the most up-to-date situation in Wales, what do we see in the objective 1 area? That part of Wales has the fastest growth rate in the whole of the United Kingdom, and we have seen 84,000 jobs created or safeguarded because of objective 1 funding. If we consider gross value added per head in west Wales and the valleys, we find an increase of 17 per cent. from 1997. What is weird is that there appears to be a determined effort to talk Wales down all the time and say that things are terrible and awful. The reality in Wales is quite different, and the people of Wales know that.

The objective 1 programme is a success, but I would argue that it has been particularly successful since the mid-term review. That review accurately identified a number of weaknesses in the early part of the programme, and I hope that hon. Members accept that. There was too much bureaucracy and partnership in the structural fund programme, to the extent that things were becoming ossified in part. That has been put right by the Welsh Assembly Government, to their credit, and we now have a far more streamlined and effective programme.

The crucial question is, from the financial perspective, what happens during the next funding period. Another crucial question following from that is where continuing support for west Wales and the valleys should come from. Should it come via Brussels or from central Government in London? That is a critical question because the British Government have made a commitment to ensure that that extra funding continues, so that the excellent work of the objective 1 programme will continue whatever happens. The critical question is whether it is better to have money from Brussels or from London.

[Mr. David]

On the basis of my experience, it is better to have a more streamlined system, with money coming directly from the Treasury and London. I give three reasons for that. First, from a British Government perspective—Wales is part of Britain, let us not forget that—and a UK financial perspective, it makes sense to ensure that we have in place a better system for regional funding. For every extra £1.60 that the British Government would have to give to Brussels under the Commission's proposals, only £1 would come back. In other words, we would be short-changed, and the money would not necessarily go to some of the most disadvantaged parts of the European Union. Under the present Commission proposals, some of that money would go to some of the most prosperous states. The British argument has it, quite sensibly, that it is better for the richer members of the European Union to ensure that they have the correct support in their own nation states to help their less prosperous regions. That makes a great deal of common sense.

There is also the issue of the rebate, and the size of the British Government's contribution to the EU budget. If hon. Members wish to go into the general election arguing for a big increase in the size of the EU budget, a big increase in the size of Britain's contribution and an end to the British rebate, I can tell them that ordinary people in Wales and elsewhere, who will have to pay more into the EU budget, will take a pretty dim view of that argument.

Mr. Simon Thomas: The hon. Gentleman has to accept that if we were to go into an election with such a policy, we would be supported by the TUC and all the Welsh local authorities, which are Labour-run.

Mr. David: There are certain qualifications that have to be added to that. It is a very complex issue and everyone is keen to make sure that we get the best possible deal, whether it is from Brussels or the British Government. That is the overriding message from local authorities and trade unions.

Mr. Thomas: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. Accepting that it is a complex issue, and accepting that the core issue is the one that both he and I identified—the best way to do it—will he stop reducing the question to a simplistic argument about which treasury pays what and address the important issue of the best way to get the best deal for west Wales and the valleys?

Mr. David: Absolutely. We are at one on that, and I hope that as the debate continues everyone will accept that we are talking about what is best for Wales. We are trying not to score cheap party political points, but to look at the facts and come to a conclusion about what is best for our country. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will do that, and accept that my party is trying to do it as well.

Much has been said about the European Commission's proposals. I would say that it is very easy for the Commission to make any sort of proposals; it is not talking about its own money, but member states' contribution. The Commission can pluck any figure it wishes from the sky, and at the end of the day the Council of Ministers will make a decision about the size of the EU budget.

The issue of trust has been raised. It is important to recognise the cold, hard facts of historical experience. We have had objective 2 and 3 funding in the past under the Conservative Administration, but prior to 1997 much European money simply stayed in Brussels. It was not drawn down; it was not claimed. That was because there was not match funding. It does not really matter at the end of the day how much money is allocated in Brussels if we do not have a sympathetic Government in London to ensure that match funding is provided. That is why it is absolutely essential that a Labour Government continue in power to ensure that the structural funds work. That is objective fact, and history proves that what I am saying is absolutely correct.

I would like to make a couple of points about why there is much to be said for the Government's case. First, much has been said about the difficulties that have been experienced with the objective 1 programme, especially during its early days. Those were certainly referred to in the debate in the House the other day. What we really require is a programme that complements what the Welsh Assembly Government are doing, not a programme that is tagged on.

One of the difficulties for the Welsh Assembly Government has been prioritising, first under the single programme document, and then under the objective 1 programme. That is because of Brussels rules. One of the great issues in south Wales is improving the transport structure: we need more roads to open up the upper parts of the valleys. Hardly any money under the objective 1 programme is devoted to that. Why? The Welsh Assembly Government want to do it, and the British Government are quite happy for it to happen, but the European Commission at the start of the programme said that transport and roads are not its priority. Therefore, objective 1 areas have suffered in practical terms because of diktats from Brussels. If the European principle of subsidiarity were applied, the Welsh Assembly Government would be able to use extra money coming from London according to their own democratically agreed priorities. That would be a huge step forward.

Adam Price (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr) (PC): How is it that the Republic of Ireland was able to access European funding precisely to invest in light rail, buses and general transport infrastructure, including the building of regional airports?

Mr. David: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point, but that money in Ireland came from the cohesion fund, not the objective 1 programme, and the rules of the cohesion fund are fundamentally different. They are specifically designed to help the development of infrastructure; objective 1 funding is not. Looking to the future, we want the greatest flexibility for the Welsh Assembly Government to use money from whatever source in the best possible way. What the Government are proposing would not short-change Wales; it would ensure that it had resources to spend as it knew best, and for that reason there is a lot to commend in the Government's proposals.

In conclusion, the issue is, as we have said, vital and complex. We need to recognise that everyone in Wales is concerned about getting the best possible deal for Wales, but I would appeal to the Plaid Cymru Members not to make cheap party political points on the issue: it is far too serious. Let us have a reasonable, constructive and sensible debate on the best way forward. If we do that, I am quite confident that Members will agree that there is much to be said for the Government's proposals.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Before I call the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) as the Plaid Cymru spokesman, I just point out that I intend to give the Minister 20 minutes to sum up on this very important debate. I take it that the Opposition spokespeople will bear that in mind when making their contributions.

2.42 pm

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I intend to be very brief, as I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) has dealt with every cogent point already during the debate. I congratulate him on securing time for this very important debate, which has been rather badly attended by Labour Back Benchers—only two of them are here—which perhaps shows the interest they take in the subject, or perhaps, being loyalists, they do not want to agree with people who are talking a bit of common sense.

Albert Owen: How childish.

Mr. Llwyd: It may be childish, but the hon. Gentleman can make his points in due course. He is no stranger to childishness himself.

On Monday we had a similar debate. We tabled an amendment and my hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) spoke very well on these points. The bottom line is this: Labour Members were crowing, unbridled in their delight, when objective 1 was grasped and taken to Wales in 1999. At the Berlin summit, we were told, the Prime Minister spent all night arguing and I have no doubt that he spoke the truth every single time he argued. Labour Members said, "We have the panacea". Yes, a huge amount of money was coming in, and by and large it has done a lot of good work. That is common ground between us all; it has to be. What is not, however, is what will happen if this proposed cut is made. What will happen to Wales? We will lose any cohesion policy, research and development money and objective 1 money.

Mr. David: No one is talking about cuts. Those are a figment of the hon. Gentleman's imagination. As we will hear from the Minister, we are talking about a continuation of the objective 1 programme, but this time the money will come directly from London rather than Brussels. Who is talking about cuts?

Mr. Llwyd: With respect, objective 1 is a Brussels programme. It cannot come from the Treasury. That is something else. The Government have been far wide of what we thought objective 1 was. The hon. Gentleman seems to want to laugh about the issue. We have been suffering from under-investment at the rate of about £401 million per year in cover from the public expenditure survey and additional matched funding. That is a fact. We have been saying it for years, and it was eventually confirmed. The late Professor Phil Williams put it on the map in the Assembly.

Adam Price: Despite what the hon. Member for Caerphilly said, it is a fact that the Commission is proposing a huge increase in spending on EU regional policy and the UK Government are proposing a cut.

Mr. Llwyd: I accept that position. If it is nonsense, or just wrong, would the Minister like to intervene to tell us that we are wide of the mark?

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I am happy to take the opportunity to deal with that point. The most significant point that has just been made is the explicit acknowledgment of the huge increase in spending envisaged with the budgetary uplift by the European Commission's proposals. I will address that in my remarks.

Mr. Llwyd: We look forward to hearing exactly what the Minister means by that when he sums up the debate.

Mr. Simon Thomas: I am sorry to cut across my hon. Friend, but I want to take him back to what the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) said. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman is absolutely committed to what he said. I think that he is wrong-headed, but I accept his good faith. He cannot say whether there will be a cut, because, unless the Minister gives one today, we do not have a guarantee about the sum that would be available under any Treasury policy. As Treasury policy is not necessarily linked to match funding or additionality, we do not know whether additional resources will be available. Those are questions to which we must have answers before we can give a response to the proposal that the hon. Member for Caerphilly asked us to support. Without the facts, we cannot support that proposal.

Mr. Llwyd: The point, surely, is that funding is guaranteed for six years under EU rules, whereas it cannot be guaranteed for that long under Treasury rules—it can be guaranteed for three years or, possibly, for the length of a Parliament. However sincerely given, the promise is not bankable in European terms, which is another problem.

The other thing that concerns me is that if the scheme is going to be replaced—repatriated—by a Treasury scheme, then, considering past performance, I sincerely believe that there will be cuts. I also believe that the scheme will be at risk of being politicised and subject to the priorities of Government. I have no doubt that areas of Wales will suffer further because of those political priorities. I also have no doubt that it will, in due course, create more social exclusion in Wales, whether in the south Wales valleys or in the more rural areas. I am extremely concerned about that. None of us wants it to happen; we are sounding the alarm. As I said, we sounded the alarm that the PES cover and additional funding were insufficient. Under the Freedom of Information Act 2000, we have been proved right.

Albert Owen: The hon. Gentleman talked about alarms. His party also gave a number of false alarms. It said that we would not secure objective 1 funding and that no additional Barnett money would be forthcoming.

I return to what my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) said about playing politics. In the Official Report, the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) said that the "issue is of... importance... before the general election."—[Official Report, 7 March 2005; Vol. 431, c. 1327.]

Surely he is raising alarms before an election.

Mr. Llwyd: My hon. Friend is raising alarms because the matter needs to be decided shortly. That is the point. It is the leader of the party of which the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen) is a member who is deciding when to hold a general election. The work has been ongoing for months. It has not been brought out of the woodwork because we may be approaching a general election. It is important because of the EU timetable.

Adam Price: My point, which I think the hon. Member for Ynys Môn will cede, was that there was an opportunity for us to debate this vital matter, which will have a major impact on all our communities, on the Floor of the House before the general election. What is wrong with that point?

Mr. Llwyd: I came here with a pinched nerve, but, because I have jumped up and down so many times, it seems to have gone. At least some good has come from the debate.

In case anyone gets the impression that we are just whinging or being alarmist, I will make a few points. I for one am not proud that GDP remains what it is in Wales. We have argued about the EUROSTAT figures. The important point is that we accept those figures, and they are the figures that will be used for a decision in the coming months. That is an important point. The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) mentioned the thousands of jobs that had been created by objective 1 in west Wales and the valleys. I do not suppose that that takes into account the thousands of jobs being done away with by his Government, who are closing down benefits offices and creating further social exclusion. I do not know the exact areas that we are talking about. If employment were such a priority, there would have been some read-across from those cuts.

We are not prepared to leave matters to the vagaries of any promise that might be forthcoming from the Treasury. I do not impugn the sincerity or honesty of the hon. Gentleman, but Treasury mandarins are people who are faceless and who do not always stick to a given set of rules. They are masters of their universe. We are unhappy about that. At least when we flushed out what was happening under the Conservative Government—money was coming to London and stopping there—our party leader Dafydd Wigley went to Brussels. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman would have supported what Dafydd Wigley said. The money was getting stuck in the Treasury in London. That is why I do not trust any bankable agreement from the Treasury. It is not worth the paper that it is written on. That is my concern.

The European Union was given clearly defined objectives. After three years of faltering, due to the Welsh Assembly Government, things in Wales eventually began to move. That did not happen soon enough; hence the position that we are in. Labour was, of course, then in coalition with the Liberal Democrats. We want to press for a further tranche of money to come direct from Europe. That money would not be subject to political interference. It would not be diverted because of spending that should, in any event, have been core spending.

Mr. Simon Thomas: Such as a war.

Mr. Llwyd: That has also happened.

My grave concern, and that of my hon. Friends, is that we push the case as hard as we can. With respect to the hon. Member for Caerphilly, I cannot understand why he does not join us in campaigning on the issue. Why has he set his face against doing so? He told us how much Wales has benefited from objective 1. He will undoubtedly wish those benefits to continue, but he seems to be completely happy for the Treasury to promise that those substantial amounts will come through directly in regional policy. Regional policy in Wales has, unfortunately, been lacking for decades. That is why we are in this awful hole.

Earlier, we referred to the loss of coal-mining jobs. I appreciate that that is nothing to do with the Labour party. However, the infrastructure is gone. Many people suddenly found that they were not employable. We are still suffering because of those particular circumstances. We are suffering decades of sickness because of the hangover caused by heavy industries.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that I want to give other spokesmen a chance to contribute to the debate. He wants the Minister to answer some of his questions, so will he be brief?

Mr. Llwyd: I accept that. I will draw my comments to a close.

This debate is timely. I hope that the fact that it has not been well attended by Labour Members is not an indication that they have given up. They should not give up, but should continue to fight, as we shall.

2.55 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) on obtaining the debate. It is vital that we take the opportunity to discuss regional funding and support for Wales and, indeed, other peripheral parts of the United Kingdom in good time, so that we have some influence on the discussions and decisions made about those important issues.

Historically, the more distant parts of the United Kingdom have suffered because the market has not functioned as well in those regions as it has in the south-eastern areas of both the UK and Wales. For a long time, the people who lived there have survived on lower incomes, had a poorer quality of life and have not had the opportunity to take part in the thriving economies that have sometimes occurred in other parts of the UK.

It was not until we obtained structural funds from the EU that we had the certainty of a continuation of support for a number of years. That enabled people to put together a considered programme rather than one-off and ad hoc projects that various Governments of various persuasions sometimes dished out for the poorer areas of the United Kingdom.

I return to objective 5b funding for rural areas. That was particularly effective in dealing with our systems. Although objective 1 funding did not come to the area of Wales that I represent, and we were concerned about that, we were happy that west Wales and the valleys benefited from it. Some of us would have said that Powys should have been included in the objective 1 area. If some of the statistical criteria had been considered more closely, I think that Powys would have qualified, on the basis that its GDP was below the 75 per cent. figure. For some peculiar technical reason, the European Union said that there could be only two NUTS areas in Wales. Including Powys would have meant three NUTS areas and that was apparently unacceptable to whoever was setting up the rules. I felt that, in a way, the competition to achieve objective 1 status was slightly belittling to Wales, in the sense that areas had to portray themselves as a poor and unsuccessful part of the United Kingdom. At one time, I compared it to an ugly competition. We had to parade up and down in front of people and say how unsuccessful we had been in the economy and that we were in desperate need of support.

Mr. Simon Thomas: The hon. Gentleman can, at least, reflect that he lost the ugly competition.

Mr. Williams: I will not take that as a personal comment. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman and I were in the competition at the same time.

Mr. Thomas: Unfortunately, I won.

Mr. Williams: Be that as it may, Wales and, certainly, west Wales and the valleys have benefited from objective 1. That is obvious from all the statistics and criteria. Indeed, one can see that structural funding has been very successful in other nations in the EU—for example, in Ireland. Even the Irish would say, however, that it is not just structural funds that have contributed to the success of their economy. They also look to investment in education and in training. Although structural funds can contribute to that, we need to put more money into education and training as well as to looking for regional support via structural funds.

The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) said that money from Brussels was no different to money from London. Yes, £1 from Brussels is the same as £1 from London. However, what is important are the conditions that are attached to that flow of money. Everybody involved in the programme committees that were set up for the introduction of objective 1 were very frustrated by the bureaucratic requirements that had to be put in place—there had to be equal men and women, and equal representatives from the public, private and voluntary sectors—and it seemed that setting up the committees was more important than delivering the programmes. Some of that has been addressed, and I know, having talked to people in the private sector, that they feel more involved than at the beginning of the process.

Having said that, the questions are: what are the Government going to do, and what commitments will they make on the issues? Although we can judge what the benefits and disadvantages of money coming from London or Europe will be, we need to know what the level of funding will be, and what commitments the Government can make. The issue that has been mentioned many times by hon. Members speaking for Plaid Cymru is that, whereas the objective and structural funds can be guaranteed over seven years and two years' transition in future, it seems highly unlikely that the Government are going to give any commitment at all above and beyond a three-year period or a Parliament.

There is also the question of match funding. I can go back a long time to when the Conservative party was in power, and some applications for European funding and support were not accompanied by additional funds—the additionality that should be required. The British Government were taken to task a number of times for that. Commissioner Bruce Millan sorted that out, and I am sure that he did a good job in ensuring that European support was never allowed to be given without such additionality.

All in all, Liberal Democrats believe that structural funding would be the best way to address the problems of Wales and other peripheral areas such as Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly. My colleagues in the Welsh Assembly say that not only should local government in Wales support the issue, but the Assembly should too. We see more benefits flowing from support and commitment over a long period of time coming from Europe, rather than the relatively short-term commitments that the Government can make, whatever they may be. For that reason, we support the maintenance of structural funds, either objective 1 or the cohesion fund.

3.3 pm

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I should like to congratulate the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) on securing the debate, and on the way in which he proposed it, ably supported by his party leader, the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd). I have always admired Plaid Cymru for their gutsiness in taking on this Government and standing up for rural communities in Wales, and how they have often made common cause with other rural MPs in supporting countryside issues. They have, on a number of occasions, been supportive of some of the campaigns that I have run, and I congratulate them on that. The hon. Member for Ceredigion was quite right when he said that the matter goes to the heart of regional policy.

The Opposition support the Government when they say that they are keen to see a reduction in the maximum size of the EU budget from 1.24 per cent. of gross EU income to 1 per cent. We support that because we agree with the Governments of France, Germany, Sweden, the Netherlands and Austria, who wrote to Romano Prodi in December 2003, making the point that a 1 per cent. limit would still allow for annual increases in the EU budget above the growth rates of national budgets in most member states. That is a key point.

[Mr. Henry Bellingham]

One should also bear it in mind—perhaps the Minister will comment on this—that there has been substantial fraud in the EU budget system. The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) recently highlighted the fact that for nine successive years—this will be the 10th year—the European Court of Auditors has refused to sign off the EU accounts. A lot of money is washing around, having gone missing.

We also support what the Government have said about the Lisbon agenda, although we should like a clearer and more focused policy on aid. On structural funds, we understand where the Government are coming from. We are concerned about the amount of bureaucracy and the lack of clear focus in how some of the funds are managed. I shall come to some of the points made by Plaid Cymru and the Liberal Democrats, but we feel that national control over those funds would enable us to target them better, at the areas that need them most.

I repeat what my MEP colleague, Philip Bradbourne, said in the European Parliament recently:

"It is no surprise to me that the funds have yet again not been signed off.

With ten years of dodgy accounts, including €5.3 billion going unused into Commission coffers from the Regional Aid Budget in one year, devolving grant aid back to Member States seems the only viable solution to an ongoing problem.

This would allow British Ministers to properly determine where and how this money is spent."

I sympathise in many ways with the hon. Member for Ceredigion, because our instinct is to support the idea of Her Majesty's Government having more control. I take on board his points, and I hope that the Minister will clarify exactly what the Government's position is, and perhaps give us some comfort that if the funds are repatriated, the same amount of money will be spent. One of the most pertinent and telling points that the hon. Gentleman made was that the Government currently have a much shorter time scale. Normally, we are talking about funding for a three-year fiscal period, possibly one Parliament, and a maximum of four years, as Parliaments tend to develop. If there is a much closer result in six or seven weeks' time, there could be another election two or three years after that. Let us not speculate too far, but the bottom line is that the EU can take a longer-term view and deliver more stability and commitment over a longer period. Can the Minister comment on that? That is the main argument against the Government's position, which is to some extent supported by my party.

I take on board the points that the hon. Gentleman made, supported by his party leader, regarding the problems that Wales faces. The former mining valleys in south Wales have not had the opportunities or the momentum to regenerate and deliver new jobs in the same way as places such as south Yorkshire, Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire have done. Those of us who attend the main Chamber regularly often hear the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) boasting about the number of extra jobs being created outside the coal industry and the amount of regeneration that has taken place in his constituency. That has not happened in the Welsh valleys, and there is obviously a good reason for that. If the Minister knows what that reason is, will he comment on it?

I have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman when he talks about some areas of Wales being left behind. In Norfolk—not far from my constituency, and in that of the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright)—there are some of the poorest wards in the country, where, without EU funding, there would be really serious problems. I must declare an interest because my constituency has received objective 5b status funding that has made a significant difference. The Minister must satisfy the Plaid Cymru Members that the Government can deliver the money and make up any deficit.

I shall make one final point so that the Minister will have 20 minutes in which to wind up. One of the key points that goes to the nub of the subject is the rebate. I listened to what the Chancellor said the other day: he said that the rebate is fully justified. He made that clear in Berlin when the last EU budget was fixed, and that continues to be the British position. There have been worrying reports that the Government have secured a deal with EU leaders to postpone negotiations on the rebate until after the general election. Is that the case? The relationship between the repatriation of structural funds and the debate is absolutely crucial. I hope that the Minister will be able to answer that point, and the other points that have been ably and succinctly put by the hon. Member for Ceredigion and his colleague.

3.10 pm

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) on securing the debate. I am genuinely grateful for the opportunity to explain the Government's proposals for future EU structural and cohesion policy after 2006. It has been an interesting and often passionate debate, and I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David), who added some important perspective to the hon. Gentleman's remarks, both on the strengthening of the Welsh economy in recent years and the reality of the proposals under discussion.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) made a characteristically understated speech, if I may say so, some of which I shall endeavour to respond to. I shall be happy to address the points that he raised. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) wisely acknowledged, as he put it, that £1 from London is worth as much as £1 from Brussels, and he went on to acknowledge the streamlining of European funds that has taken place in recent years.

I am grateful for the support of the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) for our approach to the Lisbon agenda. On the specific issue of the rebate, with which he concluded, it will be no surprise that I can assure him that the position remains as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that work continues on the rebate and the wider issue of the financial perspective. As the hon. Gentleman will appreciate, other parties are privy to those discussions.

I assure the House that the Government are committed to a strong regional policy that is at the heart of our efforts to achieve high and stable levels of growth and employment, ensuring that economic prosperity reaches every part of the United Kingdom. We have significantly increased spending on regional policy across the UK, focusing resources on drivers of productivity such as skills, infrastructure, enterprise and new technology.

As a consequence of devolution in Wales, the Welsh Assembly Government are driving forward their programme for regional development, and are currently driving forward the "Winning Wales" strategy to provide an over-arching framework for Wales's continued regeneration. The Welsh Assembly Government are providing significant match funding for Wales's current structural fund programmes. As we have heard, Wales has benefited from a unique funding arrangement with the UK Government, "Barnett Plus", to support the programmes. In the spending reviews of 2002 and 2004, the Welsh Assembly Government were allocated an extra £106 million for 2005–06, an extra £128 million for 2006–07 and an extra £147 million for 2007–08, in addition to the block grant under the Barnett formula in order to provide match funding for its objective 1 programmes.

I accept that the structural funds have played an important role in supporting valuable initiatives in recent years in Wales and other parts of the United Kingdom. However, domestic spending—national programmes and co-financing for structural funds projects—plays an increasingly important role in regional development. I would add to that a personal perspective from my constituency: there should be recognition that although real expertise has developed, not least within local government, and a capacity to deal with Brussels, that expertise all too often reflects a mindset that developed during the time of the previous Government, when many of us looked to Brussels hoping for regional support when Whitehall and Westminster were providing very little such support.

There is an opportunity now, not least given the significant uplift in regional expenditure being made by this Government, to develop our thinking on regional funding. It is essential to understand that three quarters of public spending on regional development in the UK already comes from domestic sources, and we must recognise that in any scenario that proportion is set to increase in the near future. The enlargement of the European Union and the entry of 10 poorer countries means that EU regional funding will, inevitably and rightly, shift to the new member states, and the richer countries such as the UK will increasingly depend on national resources to fund their regional development. This new situation calls for a fundamental reappraisal of the EU's regional policy. We are determined to push for effective reform of the structural and cohesion funds that delivers a good result for the UK and its nations and regions, as well as for the other member states and the EU as a whole.

On timing, the current regulations governing the structural and cohesion funds will expire at the end of 2006. Negotiations on the future of the structural and cohesion funds began in September 2004 and are continuing under the Luxembourg presidency.

Let me set out the Government's objectives for structural funds reform. The UK has five main objectives for reform of the funds, which were set out by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in two statements to Parliament in September and December 2003. First, we want to develop an EU regional policy that fully supports, and adds value to, the ambitious devolution, decentralisation and regional development agenda already being pursued domestically. Secondly, we wish to ensure that the structural funds actively support the EU's agenda, set at Lisbon, Gothenburg and elsewhere, for higher productivity, employment and sustainable development. Thirdly, we wish to concentrate the EU's necessarily limited financial and administrative resources on the poorest member states, which are most in need of assistance. Fourthly, we want to develop simpler and more flexible implementation and monitoring arrangements for structural funds programmes, which are proportionate to the amount of funding available. Finally, we are determined to secure a fair budgetary deal for the UK taxpayer and a total EU budget of no more than 1 per cent. of EU gross national income.

The Government have put forward detailed reform proposals as a means of securing those objectives. We have proposed that richer member states should, in future, fund regional programmes from domestic sources, and that the EU's limited resources should be focused on the poorest member states, where EU intervention is likely to have the greatest impact and value. That would introduce genuine EU solidarity and help to ensure that the enlargement of the EU to 25 members is recognised as a success. However, for clarification, I want to point out that the Government are not advocating that regional policy should be renationalised in the richer member states. On the contrary, we believe that there should continue to be EU-wide co-ordination of regional policy in all member states, so that we continue to work towards shared goals across the Union.

Mr. Simon Thomas: I would be interested to hear the Minister elaborate on that point. He said that one of the Government's objectives was to give support to the poorest European states. We understand the thinking behind that, but that member state-led approach can ignore the real regional disparities that exist even in richer member states. Germany springs to mind as an example. West Wales and the valleys is poorer than Slovenia, yet his proposals would divert funds to Slovenia but not necessarily to west Wales and valleys. He needs to say a little more about what European perspective can be brought to bear to ensure that member states do not get away with not delivering internal regional equality. If he does not do that, people will lose faith in the European ideal.

Mr. Alexander: I have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's analysis, but no sympathy with his prescription. Of course it is a factual reality that there can be regions even in richer member states that continue to suffer deprivation and poverty. That is why, for example, the UK has such an active regional policy, which we have pursued with such vigour over recent years.

On the relationship between the role of member states and the role of the EU, let me offer a few more words by way of clarification. We have put forward proposals for an EU framework for regional policy whereby all member states would agree to a set of high-level, outcome-focused objectives for regional policy, which support the achievement of the Lisbon and Gothenburg agendas. According to our approach, member states would continue to share best practice and monitor progress through a process of peer review.

[Mr. Alexander]

At the same time, however, we remain fully aware of the challenges faced by regions in the UK, particularly those with current objective 1 status—as we have been discussing—and we are determined to support their continued economic development. It is for that reason that we have made an unprecedented guarantee—if our reform proposals are accepted—to increase domestic funding for regional policy in the UK. If our proposals are accepted, we have undertaken to increase the domestic funding for regional policy by the amount that our regions would have received under a no-reform scenario in an enlarged EU. Of course, such a guarantee would not be possible if there was a major expansion in the structural funds budget. As was pointed out, any expansion would inevitably come at a cost to the UK taxpayer, leaving less money for national spending. That is why it is in all our interests to secure a fair budgetary deal for the UK as a whole.

The Government set out their detailed methodology for applying the guarantee in their written statement to Parliament on 11 December 2003. If our reform proposals were accepted, we would increase the domestic resources available for regional policy by the amount that our regions would have received under the current arrangements for allocating structural funds, were they applied under a no-reform scenario to an EU of 25 member states. In order to calculate the value of the guarantee, it will be necessary to know data such as the gross domestic product and employment statistics for the whole EU for the most recent three years available prior to the start of the next programme period in 2007. It is unlikely that the most recent data will be for 2001 to 2003. That information will not be available until the end of 2005.

The Commission's proposals for reform of the funds have set much of the context for the debate. The proposals were set out in its third cohesion report in February 2004 and in a package of draft structural and cohesion funds regulations for the next European Community financial perspective, published in July 2004. The Commission proposes to focus the expanded budget on three new priorities: a convergence objective, which, like the current objective 1, would be allocated to regions with a GDP below 75 per cent. of the EU average; a regional competitiveness and employment objective, to foster competitiveness and support labour market programmes in richer regions; and a European territorial co-operation objective, which would replace the current Interreg initiative to promote transnational and cross-border co-operation projects.

The Government have welcomed aspects of the Commission's approach, including its proposals, on the Lisbon and Gothenburg agendas, to strengthen the strategic focus of EU regional policy. However, we have serious concerns regarding aspects of the Commission's approach. First, it is dependent on an unaffordable expansion of the EU budget. The Commission is advocating a major—indeed, 33 per cent.—real-terms increase in the structural funds budget from €257 billion in the current cycle to €374 billion for the next EU financial perspective. Its proposals would require a significant increase in the contributions made by member states to the EU budget at a time when Governments are required to demonstrate budget discipline.

Secondly, the Commission's proposals fail to focus the EU's limited resources on its key priority of the economic development of the poorest member states. As was acknowledged, its proposals would lead to a 50:50 split of funding between old and new members and to the continued, wasteful recycling of resources between net contributors to the EU budget. Thirdly, the Commission's proposals do not go far enough to simplify the bureaucratic arrangements for implementing programmes or to give member states, their nations and their regions greater flexibility to deliver programmes that genuinely reflect local needs.

What would be the impact for Wales? It has been suggested today that the Commission's expansionist budgetary proposals may hold some attractions for some Welsh stakeholders. However, as I hope to explain, the Commission's proposals would offer a poor deal for Wales and no security for our poorer Welsh regions. By contrast, the Government's approach offers a genuine guarantee of continued funding for Wales and a fair deal for Welsh taxpayers.

First, it is important to understand that the Commission's proposals in no way constitute a credible offer of funding for the UK's regions. Net contributors to the EU budget, such as France, Germany, Austria, Sweden and the Netherlands, are firmly opposed to the Commission's budgetary proposals and share the Government's determination to maintain a total EU budget of 1 per cent. of EU gross national income. The Commission's proposals simply promise money from a pot that does not exist and which will not be agreed by member states.

Secondly, it is essential to remember that the UK is a net contributor to the EU budget and that all receipts from the EU will come at a cost to the UK taxpayer. This is not free money. We currently contribute about €1.60 for each euro that we receive. In order to continue to receive substantial structural fund receipts following enlargement, the UK will inevitably have to make much greater contributions to the EU budget, leaving less money available for domestic spending on regional policy in Wales and across the whole the UK.

As a result, increased contributions to the EU budget would reduce the amount of money that Wales receives in the form of a block grant under Barnett for regional spending and other domestic spending. In contrast with the Commission's proposals, the Government's guarantee represents a firm commitment, if our approach to reform is adopted, to increase resources for regional policy in the UK for the whole of the next structural funds cycle. We therefore believe that the guarantee offers far more certainty for Welsh regions than the Commission's unrealistic and unsustainable proposals.

The structural funds currently constitute only a small fraction of total expenditure on regional policy in the richer member states. Structural funds account for only one quarter of expenditure on regional policy in the UK and will, under any reform scenario, represent an even smaller fraction of total expenditure in the future. It is therefore far more important for the Welsh regions that the Government should achieve a fair budgetary deal for the UK, based on a disciplined and sustainable EU budget, than that continued structural funds receipts should be secured in the next financial perspective on the basis of a budget that we do not regard as being a credible way forward.

Mr. Simon Thomas: Does the Minister not see that, for many people in Wales, the difficulty with his proposals is that he has set out an approach that does not inform the people in west Wales and the valleys how much money they can expect from the Treasury until at least the end of 2005, if not later? The suspicion must be that the Government are hanging on for favourable statistics before they can make their promise and commitment. In the meantime, there are proposals on the board from the Commission. He has described them as unrealistic, but they are supported by other member states. Can he not see the difficulty that his Government will be in this year in trying to advocate a policy that he cannot put a figure to? Until a figure is available, people will be deeply suspicious of what the Government are setting out to achieve.

Mr. Alexander: The hon. Gentleman raises a number of points; let me endeavour to answer them. First, on the timing in relation to the Government's position, as I sought to reflect in my remarks, the terms of the guarantee were offered in a written statement to Parliament on 11 December 2003. In that sense, it does not strengthen his argument to suggest that we are doing things on the basis of figures that may emerge in due course. On the substantive point that he raises, I would have more sympathy were the Commission in a position to give the exact cash figure that, under its proposals, would be achieved in Wales, or any other area that presently qualifies for funding, on the basis of the future financial perspective. However, nobody is in a position to give such an undertaking on the basis of negotiations that are presently under way. Simultaneous negotiations are taking place both on structural funds and support for them, and on the wider issue of the financial perspective.

It diminishes rather than enhances the hon. Gentleman's argument to suggest that somehow the British Treasury is at odds with the EU. It raises the question of whether there is a political motive for questioning the commitment of the British Government and at the same time upholding the integrity of the EU. That is a debate that I have had on many occasions with Scottish nationalists. It seems curious to be determined to prove the efficacy and success of a wider political union, but unwilling to accept the important contribution that the British Union makes to the livelihood and well-being of people in Wales.

I conclude by underlining again the Government's commitment to tackle persistent regional disparities in the UK. We accept that poverty still scars Wales, Scotland and other regions and nations in the UK. Perhaps the difference between the Welsh nationalists and the Government is that they still regard the English border as what is scarring Wales, whereas we see the challenge of addressing issues such as child and pensioner poverty. We are convinced that our reform proposals would ensure the best deal for the UK's nations and regions, while setting EU regional policy on a sustainable footing and ensuring genuine solidarity between member states.

Farming (Lewes)

3.28 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise a matter that is important for my constituency. Mine is a rural constituency that stretches from the coast up to the borders of Haywards Heath and Uckfield, and it covers a wide area. The number of farmers may be relatively small compared with the rest of the population, but what they do is important—beyond their numbers—in social, environmental and economic terms. In fact, according to the Library, they comprise 6.3 per cent. of my constituents, including spouses and partners.

There is uncertainty among local farmers about what the future holds for farming generally and for them in particular. That is not simply driven by the faster speed of life and the changes that are coming to the common agricultural policy. It is also about what strategic role the Government have in mind for farmers and farming in the 10, 20, 30 and 40-year scenario. Is it the Government's view that there should be a move towards self-sufficiency in food production or, at the other extreme, do they think that it does not matter whether we produce food, because world trade will take care of us? What is their view on that strategic matter?

For what it is worth, my view is that, in this uncertain world, we do not know where we will be in 20, let alone in 50, years' time. It would therefore be prudent for us to be more self-sufficient in food and energy than we currently are, in order to ensure that we are able to cope with potentially unstable geopolitical situations in the longer term. I am interested to hear the Minister's comments on that. We certainly do not want farmland to be transformed into housing estates and golf courses in such a way that any withdrawal of agricultural land cannot be undone in the future.

As for what the Government and the European Union are doing, I welcome the move towards a single farm payment. That is a sensible innovation, and I hope that it will be useful for farmers and for the environment. However, it is important to make the point that, for that system to work, there needs to be prompt payment to farmers. The Minister will be aware that there have been complaints over the years—indeed, I have written to him myself on some occasions—about the performance of the Rural Payments Agency.

If we are to get ownership of the single farm payment from the farming community, it is important that there are prompt payments. That means that payments should be made in December, rather than in January or February as is currently suggested. Will the Minister consider an arrangement for the historic element of the single payment scheme to be paid as an advance payment? Have the Government examined that and is he able to say something positive on it?

I also welcome the environmental stewardship scheme, which, again, is useful in providing both some sort of continuity for farmers and continuity of income. The only criticism I have is that the paperwork, particularly for the entry-level scheme, seems to be enormous. I spoke to some farmers this morning and they told me that they were concerned that they had to fill out lots of forms in order to qualify. In their view, that was a deterrent, although they will probably go along with the scheme. Of course, the Minister must be rigorous, to ensure that there is no fraud and to ensure that all the necessary points are covered. However, there is always a balance between proper rigorous control and not overburdening people with paperwork. I hope that he will bear that in mind as the scheme unfolds.

I want to discuss another important point. To prepare myself for this debate, I spoke to a range of farmers in my constituency. It is strange how many of them came up with the same points. That suggests that the points that I am making today are of general concern in my constituency and, perhaps, beyond.

One such point, which the Minister will be familiar with, is the uneven relationship that exists between the farming community—the suppliers—and the purchasers of their goods, particularly the supermarkets. That uneven relationship means that while the price paid to farmers for their produce has stagnated or fallen, supermarket profits have rocketed. For example, he will know that the price of a litre of milk in my part of the world was about 25p a litre in 1996 and it is now down at about 18.9p a litre—and that represents a marginal increase in the past year or so. That price is way below the price of almost 10 years ago. That is clearly not an economic situation that can be sustained indefinitely.

Let us consider the finished cattle prices situation. The Minister might know that in 1993, there was an average price of 128p a kilogram, which decreased to 90p a kilogram in 2002. As for the relationship between the suppliers and the supermarkets, there is, in my view at least, a damning statistic. In terms of finished cattle prices—the farm-gate prices—in 1988, 67 per cent. of the retail price was related to the producer. That percentage had dropped to 47 per cent. in 2003, which meant a further squeeze on producers and more profits for the supermarkets.

Of course, no one is against profits. We all adhere to a capitalist society these days. However, it is worth pointing out that Tesco is scheduled to make £2 billion this year and it will make a profit of some £115,000 in the time taken by this short half-hour debate. In other words, it will probably make more profit in five minutes than some of my farmers will make in an entire year. That is a rather uneven relationship—one that the Government ought to correct.

The Minister will be aware that the Office of Fair Trading has been involved in this matter and that it concluded the last time it considered the matter in a rather peculiar manner that, although there was a problem, the OFT was going to do nothing about it. It has now done some further work, as he will know. Perhaps he will enlighten me on that in his response. Part of the work involved obtaining information from supermarkets by conducting a focused compliance audit of each of the four supermarkets, dealing with suppliers.

I welcome that approach, because clearly no one will complain directly about the supermarkets—not because there is not a problem, but because they are frightened of being squeezed out if they do so. They think that they will be picked on if they make a complaint. It is therefore important that an independent rigorous way of analysing the trade between supermarkets and suppliers exists, to pick up what most people think is going on, which is that supermarkets are exploiting their suppliers, particularly the farmers. I hope that the Minister will be able to say something positive about that. I wonder whether he has considered the idea of either a food trade inspector in the OFT, which my party supports, or a buyers' charter, which the National Farmers Union has put forward as an alternative.

The consequence of the uneven relationship is that some farmers wonder why they are in the business at all. They look at the money that they are earning and what they are paying their employees; they see that they are not able to provide money for reinvestment and they do not feel that they are getting a fair wage. One tenant farmer said to me this morning that he may as well hand back his land to the landowner. That is a sad state of affairs.

We want our tenant farmers to survive and we want a diversity of farmers in this country, rather than a decreasing number of ever-bigger farmers. That is the way to help social cohesion as well as to provide diversity in the agricultural sector. Does the Minister agree that we should not necessarily welcome the move towards fewer and fewer farms and fewer and fewer owners?

As for local matters, which follow on from that point, we must try to protect the local infrastructure, so far as we can, and we must also ensure that it is expanded wherever possible. There used to be a number of abattoirs in my constituency, but they have all closed. It is a long way to go to the abattoir in Guildford or the one in Broad Oak from my constituency. The ones in Wivelsfield and Ringmer have closed.

Consequently, animals are now being taken further to slaughter, which is bad, for animal welfare reasons. It is bad for the farmer for economic reasons and bad for the environment generally because it causes extra lorry journeys. The closure of small abattoirs and the need to travel further to have animals slaughtered has no benefit. What are the Government doing to encourage smaller abattoirs to open to serve local needs? The situation in this country is vastly different from that in France, where there tends to be an abattoir in each local area. Farmers are far more connected in that way to their local market.

The Minister will know the controversy that there has been over the possible closure of Hailsham market, which is a cattle market that serves my constituents, although it is based in the constituency of the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry). That market has had a sword hanging over its head. It is important that it survives, for the same reasons that I think local abattoirs should survive.

Local suppliers are important in other ways as well. A farmers' market takes place on the first Saturday of the month in the pedestrianised precinct in Lewes. It is tremendously popular and hugely successful. People like to have local markets and they like to buy local produce. They support such efforts in vast numbers and they are disappointed when they go to their supermarkets and find that they can buy one or two varieties of apples only, as opposed to the vast number of varieties that there used to be when there were greengrocer shops. Some of the varieties have come from France and elsewhere. Why is it not possible for supermarkets to have far more local produce? Why do none of the supermarkets in my constituency have a Sussex food counter? What is the Minister doing to encourage the retail trade to buy more products locally and to support local producers far more than it has done?

One consequence of not supporting local producers is that supermarkets ratchet up huge amounts of lorry miles transporting food hither and thither across the world. The supermarkets in our country alone accrue 670 million miles in lorry movements every day; that is the equivalent of two return trips to the moon. That statistic comes from data from the supermarkets themselves; I secured the information from them, and it is included in a report on supermarkets that is on my website. That is a gigantic amount of travel; it is unsustainable in environmental terms, as well as being undermining of local supply and produce.

It would be helpful if the country-of-origin labelling rules were tighter, so that people who want to buy British food can do so. Will the Minister look into that? Can things that are imported and then packaged in this country properly be described as British? I understand that that sometimes happens.

All the farmers I spoke to raised the matter of tuberculosis in cattle. It is a serious issue, particularly in my constituency and the Sussex area. One farmer who wanted to be identified—his name is Paul Collinson—tells me that he has a closed pedigree herd, but there are always TB cases in it so he cannot sell his pedigree cattle, expect to the Minister's Department. Testing takes two days, which slows matters down, as well as having a cost. He says that the Department no longer tests badgers, as it used to do some years ago. He also questions what the policy should be on the removal of roadside badgers. He tells me that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—as the Minister's Department was then known—had a policy of removing such badgers until 1991, but that now, in Sussex at least, that is left to the farmers themselves to deal with, which is an extra cost to them. I do not know whether that is true, but perhaps the Minister can enlighten me.

There seems to be a proven link between TB in badgers and TB in cattle—I should point out at this point that I am my party's animal welfare spokesman. Does the Minister accept that that link is now established? We have been testing for a long time—we have had the Krebs report and other investigations—but nothing much seems to happen. What are the Government going to do to deal with TB in cattle? There are three possible ways forward: either the Minister must find a proper vaccine for cattle, which is my preferred solution if it can be achieved, or he must introduce a badger cull, which the farmers believe is necessary—although many people would be uncomfortable with that—or he must introduce compensation payments to recognise the fact that the Government are not solving the problem and that farmers are significantly out of pocket. Please will the Minister tell us what is the Government's policy on TB in cattle, with particular reference to my constituency, as my farmers would welcome hearing that?

I turn to a few small environmental matters that affect farmers. The Minister will be aware that new regulations will be introduced to deal with farm waste. As an environmentalist, I support the idea of ensuring that we deal with our waste properly, but can the Minister assure me that he has thought through the consequences of the regulations in relation to farm plastics? Will he ensure that there is a system in place to deal with farm plastics, including a national collection system, before the regulations come into force? We do not want a repeat of the fallen stock fiasco, which occurred when regulations and a system were in place. Will those regulations be in place? Will the National Farmers Union and others be properly consulted about them?

[Norman Baker]

There are two further small environmental matters. Biomass has the potential to provide an income for farmers, particularly on set-aside land. I welcome that, and we should offer further encouragement to farmers to go down that road where that is appropriate. However, some of my farmers feel that the Government are not doing enough to promote that. What more will the Government do to promote the take-up of biomass on set-aside land?

Lastly, the Minister will be aware of an issue I raised in respect of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill. Fly-tipping on farmland—and, indeed, on private land generally—is a significant problem. In a letter of 3 March, the Minister's colleague, the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment said:

"The current defence of not knowingly caused or permitted will remain to protect innocent victims of fly tipping."

That is true up to a point, but there is still a requirement to remove the material, and I fail to see why farmers should pick up the bill for something that they have not done.

This has been a run-around-the-houses speech, but these are important matters for the farmers in my constituency. I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply.

3.45 pm

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I welcome this opportunity to respond to what the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) referred to as a run-around-the-houses speech. I congratulate him not only on securing this debate, but on managing to pack in a whole series of questions, each of which would justify a short Adjournment debate on its own. In the last few minutes alone, he referred to biomass and fly-tipping. We have had exchanges on those issues, and I understand that they are important, but the hon. Gentleman has covered so many topics that I doubt that I can do justice to them all. All I can say is that I will write to him after this debate to deal with any topics that I do not have time to address now.

The hon. Gentleman began by asking a large strategic question about the future of farming. He related that to farmers in his constituency, but in order to answer it one has to look at the wider picture, as, indeed, he invited me to do. The Government's view is that our farmers need to be sustainable in terms of their income and viability for the future and need to be entrepreneurial in order to achieve that. The Government want to support farmers to act effectively as businesses, as many of them already do, instead of looking backwards to the period of subsidy, which led to a dependence culture, rather than an entrepreneurial one.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees with the steps that we have taken to work with the industry through the strategy for sustainable food and farming. This year is a year of massive change for the farming industry. It is the first year of applications for the new single payment scheme, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The new environmental stewardship scheme will also be introduced, as will the whole farm approach, later in the year. Those are three vital building blocks as we move towards creating a sustainable future for farming and for food industries. In 2002—which is not that long ago, although it sometimes feels like long ago—we set out our vision for the long-term development of the industry. The theme of reconnection runs through that vision; reconnecting farming with the enhancement and protection of the environment, and reconnecting farmers with both their markets and the needs of society through higher animal health and welfare standards and higher food safety standards. It is an approach that has sustainability and sustainable development at its core.

I recognise that change is accompanied by challenges as well as opportunities. Not all farmers will find that transition easy; some farmers will have to change from their traditional approach, or make choices about whether they want to continue in farming. The hon. Gentleman is right to highlight that. However, although some farmers will find it difficult to adapt, creating a market-focused and environmentally and socially responsible industry—which does things that the public want and that bring public benefit, but which is also market-orientated in terms of producing what the consumer wants—will offer great rewards for farming and society alike. We must not lose sight of the long-term outcomes that we seek to deliver.

3.49 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.2 pm

On resuming—

Alun Michael: I was explaining how change is both challenging and beneficial to the farming industry. It is worth underlining the fact that the groundbreaking deal that we secured on the reform of the common agricultural policy removed the link between production and subsidy for the first time. That decoupling is integral to the vision of reconnection that I referred to earlier and will help to deliver an increase in returns from farming.

Economists from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs estimate that on average farm incomes could rise by about £100 million relative to what would have happened in the absence of a single payment scheme. That represents about 3 per cent. of total income from farming in 2003. Many small farms are also very competitive and are being developed by farmers as effective businesses.

The hon. Gentleman's suggestion that we should not simply sit back and allow farms to increase in size is understandable, but an increase in size is one way to achieve efficiency and sustainability in parts of the farming industry, although there are alternatives. Diversification is one, and increasing returns to the farm as the primary producer is another.

I would cite two examples in Sussex. The first is the Sussex Downs Conservation Board, which is working with a number of farmers to produce south downs lamb as part of a range of locally branded products being developed under the south downs landscape enhancement initiative. The project aims to boost the sale of local products and help sustain the south downs habitat, so there is an economic benefit to the farmers and an environmental benefit to the area. We have helped that through the rural enterprise scheme.

The second example is the Sussex producers consortium, a group of livestock producers working together to process and market their meat and meat products. They have taken a 50 per cent. share in a meat pie making company, ensuring that they get a better share of the retail price and enabling local produce to be sold locally. Those are two examples, and there are many other ways in which farmers can ensure that they get a better return for their work.

The hon. Member for Lewes welcomed the development of the single payment and referred to the welcome received by the high level stewardship scheme in the last week or two. He asked about prompt payment. It appeared to me that he was talking about early, rather than prompt, payment. The Rural Payments Agency was engaged in a considerable period of change when it was given the task of implementing the CAP reforms. It faces a challenging time, but neither it nor we have underestimated that challenge and we are confident that the RPA will deliver.

It must be pointed out that the payment window for the single payment scheme is from 1 December 2005 to 30 June 2006. That means that a payment on 28 June would not be a late payment. However, that is not what we are aiming for. We are aiming for payment as early as possible within the window, but we need to be realistic. The agency will aim to make as many payments as possible as early as practicable within the time scale. That remains the case. Payments are likely to be made from February 2006 onwards, well within the payment window. In response to the hon. Gentleman's question, we have asked officials to investigate the options for interim payments, and they are due to report back to me shortly.

The benefit is that as a result of the changes it should be possible to make payments in future years even earlier in the payment window and to give greater certainty to farmers as to when they should expect those payments, because this is the year of transition and great challenge. We have a transitional year in which we want to help farmers to as great an extent as we can, and are investigating ways to do so. We will announce the outcomes of our deliberations as soon as we can. We are working closely with the industry and the representative bodies on those issues.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to concern about the power of supermarkets. We share that concern. The issue is what one can do to make sure that we achieve a fair outcome without damaging competitiveness. That is why we were keen to encourage the Office of Fair Trading to undertake its review of the operation of the supermarkets' code.

The hon. Gentleman was right to say that the outcome of the review was disappointing in that it did not point to specific actions. However, that is why the OFT commissioned a focused audit of supermarkets' dealings with suppliers following the review. That is due to be published in the next few weeks, and we should consider its findings and recommendations carefully. I have no doubt that Members such as the hon. Gentleman, who represent seats with a considerable farming element, will want to look at those recommendations and debate them with Ministers as soon as the report becomes available.

It is also worth pointing out that for the most recent months where figures are available, the price of milk is 19.12p per litre. Despite fears about what would happen, the average farm gate price—18.56p per litre—was actually higher in 2004 than 2003. That was the highest since 2001. The University of Manchester report, "Economics of Milk Production, England and Wales; 2002/03", found that 60 per cent. of milk produced in the UK was produced at a profit, but that that production was by 40 per cent. of dairy farmers. Clearly, there is a huge disparity in the costs of production and profitability. Figures going back further than the past few years show that over a longer period the issues of profitability in the milk industry form a pattern that requires close scrutiny.

The hon. Gentleman referred specifically to TB. Bovine TB is one of the most difficult animal health problems facing Government and the farming industry in Great Britain. We are committed to finding the best way to combat the disease, backed by available evidence and taking account of all interested parties, including the taxpayer. Some 5.7 per cent. of herds were affected by TB restrictions at some time during 2004 and 2003.

The number of new incidents in 2004 was slightly up on 2003; 3,313 compared with 3,220. Those are the provisional figures that we have. Several key measures are being introduced, including the emphasis on keeping areas clean and reducing TB in hot spot areas, the new surveillance measures announced last autumn, and the work with the farmer-chaired stakeholder group to finalise a detailed proposal to implement pre-movement testing of cattle. Those proposals will be subject to further consultation.

It is worth remembering that in 2003–04 we spent more than £15 million on research, covering among other things the transmission of bovine TB within and between species. Research included the randomised badger culling trial, improved diagnosis and vaccine development. I know that the hon. Gentleman has asked in the past about the possibility of vaccine development as a means of dealing with the issue.

A limited road traffic accident survey is being conducted in seven counties of England. They are the lower-incidence-comparative counties of Cornwall, Devon, Gloucestershire, Herefordshire, Worcestershire, Shropshire and Dorset. Farmers outside those areas can submit badger carcases for private post mortem at the Veterinary Laboratories Agency, but that involves a cost. The fact is that dealing with bovine TB is far from easy, and the trouble is that some outcomes of the work done in Northern Ireland have been presented in some parts of the media as if they provide an instant solution. I think the hon. Gentleman will be aware that they do not. There were considerable reservations about some of the conclusions that the industry jumped on.

[Alun Michael]

One point I would make to the hon. Gentleman is that the sorts of examples I gave earlier about how the farming industry is making itself competitive nationally, and locally, by getting a more effective return for the farmer, require the industry to take the lead. The purpose of government is to work alongside and support the industry to become more effective and competitive, but the ownership of becoming truly competitive and effective must lie with the industry. Many farmers are demonstrating what can be done to change and become successful.

We are committed to supporting the farming industry through the current period of change in order to leave it well equipped to succeed in the future. In particular, we will launch a business advice service aimed at getting farmers to grips with the business implications of CAP reform. That will complement existing technical advice on issues such as cross-compliance, pollution minimisation, and conservation. Such headings indicate the sort of adjustments with which farmers have to cope.

We are also supporting bodies such as the Food Chain Centre, English Farming and Food Partnerships and the dairy, red meat and cereals industries forums to help the farming industry improve its own competitiveness. The methods for that must be collaboration, co-operation, benchmarking, and the sharing of best practice, as well as the identification of solutions to sector-specific issues.

The hon. Gentleman referred to fly-tipping on farmland as one of his specific queries. Again, there is a considerable amount of detail, so I repeat my offer to write to him about some of the issues I have been unable to cover in full during this short debate. The Government are committed to tackling the problem of illegally deposited waste or fly-tipping. It is a huge antisocial problem, affecting local authorities, the Environment Agency, other organisations, landowners and farmers.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the key component of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, which is with the House of Lords. I hope that its provisions will assist the Environment Agency, local authorities and victims of fly-tipping, including farmers, and reduce that nuisance.

Cost-effective Buildings

4.15 pm

Dan Norris (Wansdyke) (Lab): The title of this debate will be a mystery to many of those people who do not live in or near my constituency; however, the debate has come about is because of the bitter experience of council tax payers in the north-east Somerset part of my constituency. It has been a sad and sorry tale. I am referring to the Bath spa project, a new, modern and exciting development that has tragically gone wrong. It is at least three years overdue and at least three times over budget, costing about £35 million when it should have cost £13 million. About £5 million of additional costs will take the project up to £40 million, and there is still no opening date.

Although I know that the Minister is well briefed about the matter, perhaps I can explain to him a little bit about the history of the project. It was announced in 1997 that the Millennium Commission had agreed to pay about £7 million towards the project. Latterly it gave about an extra £1 million, giving it a total of about £8 million. It was announced also that the local council, Bath and North East Somerset council, would contribute about £3 million, and that a private operator would make an additional contribution of about £2 million to make a project total of about £13 million.

Through no one's fault, the project got off to a bad start. Excavations at the site were protracted. Bath has historical importance, and it is important to ensure that when new buildings are constructed, one knows what historical damage one is doing. That was a necessary delay and was compounded by nature, as mallards were nesting on the site and had to be left there before construction work could start.

The start was hopeful, but sadly progress was slow. In 2000 a key decision was made about the financing of the project. It is often referred to as the time when councillors signed a blank cheque and effectively underwrote whatever costs might accrue on the project, simply because they had had little success in securing other funding. That is regrettable and should have rung the alarm bell that they were likely to get into deep water. If private initiative examines a project and realises it cannot make money, that should be a clear indication to a local authority, whose job it is to provide cost-effective local services rather than dabble in the market and risk council tax payers' money.

With the benefit of hindsight, 2000 was a bad year. There was a hung council, and all the Liberal Democrat councillors, except those with a pecuniary interest, supported the project, and about half the Labour councillors supported the underwriting of the project. About half the Tory councillors supported the project, although that is denied by Conservative councillors. However, Councillors Bailey, Dewey, Hawkins, Kew and Organ are on record as having voted for the project, so perhaps they can write to tell me if they disagree.

The year 2001 was another bad one, with very little progress. It was significant because it was the year in which the Bath spa project was intended to open. The opening date came and went, and it turned out to be the first of six opening dates that have not been achieved. The council so lacks confidence that it is not prepared to say whether the project will open this year.

Then came 2003, which turned out to be yet another bad year. The three tenors gave a terrific concert, which was very well received by local people but, sadly, it was not possible for them to open the spa as planned. The four pools were filled with water, so everything looked fine from the outside when the media were allowed in to see the three tenors walking around the premises. However, most of that water came not from the thermal springs that make Bath famous but from the mains supply, because there was difficulty in obtaining sufficient water. Questions have been raised about the contamination of some of the spa's sources, but it is hoped that those can be resolved.

Then, significantly, peeling paint was spotted in the pools. At that time, it was expected that it would cost some £500,000 to correct. That might have been a subtle issue in the general scale of things, but council tax payers started to become very angry when they realised that, in order for them to enjoy the wonderful spectacle of the three tenors at the Bath spa project, cobblestones had been laid to make the area look attractive on the outside, although it was known that, only weeks later, they would have to be dug up at the cost of many tens of thousands of pounds. There is dubious benefit from the project to my constituents, who live in the part of Bath and north-east Somerset that is outside the city—in fact, many of them live closer to Bristol than to Bath—so the requirement on them to contribute to the project via their council tax had never been received with great joy. When they saw expenditure such as that on the cobblestones, they questioned the wisdom of the project, and asked whether there was sufficient skill and talent to manage it. It was being overseen by the council.

Then we arrived in 2004. That was a truly appalling year, a year that my constituents are unlikely to forget when it comes to the saga of the Bath spa. It turned out that a special paint was required for the pools and a special surface was also needed, so the previous estimate of £500,000 was incorrect. It was estimated that that would cost between £3.4 million and £4.3 million. That is a huge sum of money for paint for four small pools. In addition, it was decided that because the surface had to be scraped away and blasted off back to the concrete for the new surface to be applied, the original concrete steps were no longer adequate and what was needed to allow people to enter and exit the pools were stainless steel steps costing £500,000. In addition, the council announced that it had overlooked £300,000 in architect fees. The public were, understandably, very concerned. In fact, they were mystified.

Can the Minister shed any light on the saga of the huge cost of the paint? How was it not foreseen at the start of the project that such expensive paint would be needed? Why was the cost not factored in at the outset? The total that is to be spent on painting four small pools is something like the cost of a small primary school; we know how much more wanted and valued a school would be. The figure defied the belief of my constituents.

Now we are in 2005, and that started badly. The per-head cost, that is the extra cost over and above the original amount for every man, woman and child in the district, including people in my constituency and that of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), turned out to be £116. To put that into context, it is nearly seven times the £17 per head that the millennium dome cost every man, woman and child. It is a stupendous figure, and one that has sent shock waves around my constituency and elsewhere in the area. The project is infamous not just among my constituents but across south-west England and beyond. Indeed, I have read reports from America about the farcical circumstances that surround it. The total cost has escalated from £13 million to about £40 million with hidden costs, and I suspect that it will be higher by the time the project is completed.

I should tell my hon. Friend the Minister that his intervention last month, when he visited the spa, was very timely and much appreciated. So far, I have not mentioned the fact that the project has been cloaked in tremendous secrecy. As soon as things started to go wrong in 2003 and 2004, media access to the project and to information about it was conspicuous by its absence, as was co-operation with representatives of the media who wanted to go inside and see what all that council tax payers' money was being spent on. That is why the Minister's visit was so valuable. He was able to call the bluff of the various parties. The construction company, Mowlem, said that it was happy for the media to attend, and claimed that Bath and North East Somerset council was causing the difficulty in terms of access. The council said the exact opposite—that it was happy for the media to attend, but the construction company had failed to let them in. A Shakespearian situation was set up. The Minister, having obtained unconditional access and agreement from Mowlem that he could attend and bring with him whomever he wanted, invited, through me, all the media.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dan Norris: I shall not give way now, but might do so if the hon. Gentleman tries again slightly later.

There was disagreement about who was responsible for the access—or the lack of it—by the media. I have here a letter from BANES' lawyers, Veale Wasbrough, dated 24 January 2005, writing to the solicitors who represent the construction company Mowlem; effectively, it is a letter from the council to the construction company. I shall not read it all, but the key paragraph says:

> "No statement or comment must be made to the press or in public with regard to the Project Works without the prior written consent of the Council."

I shall leave it for them to carry on arguing, but I know who my money is on as the cause of the difficulty about access.

The Minister came, the bluff was called and the media were allowed in. That was important and made a difference; huge public pressure developed as a consequence of people's knowing about the huge delays, and about the fact that all that money had been spent on the project, yet years on it was still a building site. Within about three days—on the Thursday following the Monday of the visit—the council and the construction company were having face-to-face meetings lasting for hours, whereas in the previous 12 months they had had hardly any face-to-face meetings at all. That was very helpful, and I thank the Minister for his important intervention. Without it, we would still be sitting there without media access and, I suspect, without discussion of the offer made by the construction company to complete the project in six months.

[Dan Norris]

Mr. Foster: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dan Norris: I want to push on. I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman if I can.

I must thank the Minister also for his frankness in discussing the competence of the council. The story is rather like that of the emperor's new clothes. The Minister came, saw and stated what everyone in my area really knew; the council had been incompetent in its handling of the project. That was confirmed, if confirmation were needed, by a television poll on BBC's "Points West" regional news programme on the evening of the Minister's visit. More than 1,200 telephone calls were received in about 20 minutes. Bath and North East Somerset council was backed by 11 per cent. of those who rang in—people who thought that the project had been handled in the right way—and 55 per cent. of callers wanted the construction company's offer to finish the project within six months to be accepted. However, amazingly, 33 per cent. were so fed up with the incompetence of BANES that they wanted the project to be abandoned, and no more money to be wasted on it. They had lost faith that it would ever be completed.

The whole affair has been a case study in how not to manage a building project and how to alienate council tax payers. Some years ago, would you believe, a council employee admitted on ITV West that the project was a loss leader. That was later denied, but was none the less said on camera. When I was in a live interview with the council leader on national breakfast TV, he just lost his temper; clearly he is not used to being criticised or asked questions about the project. I suggest strongly that he surround himself with people who do not just say yes all the time.

A year ago, I believe that the Minister set up a confidential meeting between the three parties; the council, the construction company and the architects. Unfortunately, that confidential meeting was undermined by the fact that it was leaked to the media by councillors from Bath and North East Somerset council. That was terribly unhelpful. Litigation has been rife in this matter; all the parties have been sending legal letters left, right and centre. As I understand it, only last year that council had to pay legal bills of £500,000. There is a lot more of that to come, I am sad to say.

In many respects, the council has been irresponsible in how it has dealt with the project. It produced a brochure that described what it was like to be in the spa, as if the spa had been open, and left us all with egg on our faces when people arrived from the USA, for example, only to find that it was not open. Motorway signs near the project still point to the spa, even though it has not been completed.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that this is a time-limited debate of only half an hour. I am sure that he wants the Minister to be given sufficient time to respond.

Dan Norris: Thank you, Mr. Olner; I shall respect that.

I say in conclusion that modern methods of construction should mean cost-effective buildings for council tax payers; buildings that bring pride, not ridicule. The problem with incompetent councils is that they are often way out of their depth and cannot deal with such things. I hope that Bath and North East Somerset council will stick to basics in future. The Millennium Commission needs to think about how and when it gives such large sums of money to organisations that are not up to scratch when it comes to fulfilling their commitments. The district auditor needs to be clear about how council tax payers can best be guaranteed to get value for money. The whole Bath spa fiasco has brought humiliation and damage to our area; it is like a "Carry On" film, but I am afraid that no one in my constituency is laughing.

4.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wansdyke (Dan Norris) on securing this debate on behalf of his constituents; the council tax payers, every man, woman and child of whom, I understand, is paying an estimated £116 for this absolute fiasco.

I should like to praise my hon. Friend. At times during the nine years of this fiasco, it must have seemed to him that he was a lone voice, speaking up and stating quite proper concerns on behalf of council tax payers. I am pleased that the vast majority of people in his and neighbouring constituencies now endorse what he is doing.

As the Minister with responsibility for construction, I like to get out of the Department of Trade and Industry once a week, if I can, and visit manufacturers, business groups and construction projects. Construction makes a great contribution to the UK economy. It is worth more than £225 billion a year, more than 8 per cent. of our GDP, and employs more than 2 million people in many of our leading companies and small businesses.

British architects are hailed around the world for their bold and gracious designs. British construction companies work in more than 100 countries. I have seen the work of Sir Nicholas Grimshaw, the architect of the Bath spa, on the fabulous Eden project; he is an architect of world renown. The contractor, Mowlem, also has an international reputation, with vast experience of bringing in projects on time and on budget. Both Sir Nicholas and Mowlem work with clients who are highly professional and highly competent, and who adopt modern methods of construction, consult our construction flagship body Constructing Excellence, examine the benefits of build off-site and look at best practice wherever that is found in the world. Such clients have achieved higher quality and better standards than ever before. They have reduced waste, cut deaths and are, I hope, achieving the target that I am setting of zero tolerance for any deaths in this great sector.

The best clients attain such a record. Sadly, neither Sir Nicholas nor Mowlem have found such a client in Bath and North West Somerset council—not at the inception of this ill-fated project, nor at the humiliating appearance of the three tenors at the so-called opening in 2003, nor at the building site that is the Bath spa, which I visited a month ago.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wansdyke would not have called this debate if it were not that, as far as his constituents are concerned, there is no opening date, nor end in sight for this project. In any traditional JCT contract, the construction costs represent about 85 per cent. of the project and the consultants on-costs about 15 per cent. In the Bath spa project, the client—the council—forced down the construction costs to £11 million, less than 50 per cent. of the consultant's on-costs. To achieve that, it insisted on reducing the quality of certain items. The most staggering example was a £200,000 reduction in spending on paint. There is a highly specialised type of paint that makes baths watertight. The paint—Kartoxon paint—is used by pool contractors all over Europe. It was deemed too expensive and was substituted by a concrete that was merely painted with a cosmetic paint, in spite, I understand, of there being no track record of similar usage on any similar project anywhere else.

Half a decade later, when everyone accepts that Kartoxon is the solution to the Bath spa problem, the cost of rectifying that false economy of £200,000 has risen to more than £4 million. If that were the only failing of the client, Bath and North West Somerset council, it would be put down to inexperience or incompetence; costly, but no more than that. Sadly, it appears to have been only the tip of an iceberg of incompetence.

A year ago, aware that the Government have very limited powers to intervene in such cases, I contacted, in confidence, the three main parties involved. I invited the chief executive of Bath and North West Somerset council, Sir Nicholas Grimshaw from Grimshaw's and Sir John Gains from Mowlem to meet me in the Department of Trade and Industry, away from any blaze of publicity, to discuss my solution to their seemingly intractable problem. It was a simple proposal; that the client—the council—should instruct that the work be completed, and that the other two parties should agree to abide by any arbitration or court finding.

I was operating, in strict confidence, on the principle that the work that had stalled and been delayed for years should proceed, and that no party sitting around that table should undertake any face-saving in public. Although I secured the agreement of all parties that the meeting would be kept confidential to ensure that no one faced any accusations of backing down, the chief executive of the council told his leader, councillor Paul Crossley, about it, and he told a local newspaper. In effect, that sabotaged my attempts to resolve the issue, even before we were able to sit around the table. Sadly, I am told that there is a pattern of those councillors shooting their mouths off in public and jeopardising progress at almost every stage of the project, while costs have shot through the roof.

We have a deadlock with the council, but there is also a problem of facing facts. I am pleased to say that my visit resulted in a round-table meeting with Mowlem in the same week. During that meeting, the company followed up on an offer that it had already put in draft and in writing to the council. I hoped sincerely that progress would be made. However, the council is delusional. At the time that the council chief executive was writing to me that access to the media was entirely a matter for Mowlem and that the contractor, not the council, was blocking access, the council was sending—not in confidence—the letter from its solicitors to Mowlem that my hon. Friend passed me at the beginning of the debate, stating almost precisely the opposite. The letter censures Mowlem for briefing the press on a number of occasions.

As Mowlem made clear to me, in I think, the presence of all those present on the day of my visit, it was happy for the media to visit the spa. It is now clear to me that the council were not happy about that. The reasons are also clear; we are nine years into the project, £14 million, £15 million or £16 million has been spent and the bill is estimated by the council at in excess of £20 million, with estimates rising to £35 million. I have seen the figure put at £39.5 million, and I would be surprised if it stopped there. From those escalating figures, it is clear that the council has little or no intention of coming clean with the public on its handling of the case.

Mr. Foster: I genuinely believe that the Minister has misunderstood, or been misinformed on, a number of points. I draw attention to the fact that he has got the name of the council wrong. It is Bath and North East—not north west—Somerset council. He keeps referring to his visit as "the visit of the Construction Minister". Will he confirm the letter from his private secretary that I have seen, which says that, when he came to Bath in February, he did not come as the Construction Minister but in a private capacity?

Nigel Griffiths: I am the Construction Minister and I am addressing the debate as such. In checking the record, I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has not sought an Adjournment debate on the issue. I am surprised that the excellent briefing I received from my civil servants shows that he has not sought an Adjournment debate before. To their knowledge, he has not asked any Department to help the council in trying to resolve the mess. We have a lot of expertise in the area. The sad fact that I conclude is that the most incompetent council in the country also has the weakest Member of Parliament. The problem is a council that is indecisive and a Member of Parliament who, because that council is run by his Liberal Democrat colleagues, will not stand up against them. We see many Members of Parliament having to do that in tough local situations in which we know that a council of the same political party is getting things wrong.

Mr. Foster rose—

Nigel Griffiths: I am happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman, because what we and the people of Bath want is an apology from him for the Liberal Democrats' handling of the matter.

Mr. Foster: The Minister is making the debate personal. I know that my time to intervene on him is brief, but I point out yet again that he has got so many of his facts wrong. He ought, at least, to know that, as his hon. Friend the hon. Member for Wansdyke pointed out, Bath and North-East Somerset council is a balanced council and is not run by the Liberal Democrats.

[Mr. Foster]

Nigel Griffiths: I am afraid that the defence of, "It's not me, guv" is not good enough. It is not an excuse that my constituents would accept. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's constituents would not accept it either. I have given him the chance to join us in criticising, if not condemning, the shambolic handling of the affair by his Liberal Democrat colleagues. I have thick piles of press cuttings. In them, I see not one word of criticism directed at his council colleagues on the issue. In the meantime, of course, the costs are escalating horrendously.

I understand that the council has in front of it a possible solution to the issue. The hon. Gentleman has written to me saying that he does not accept that that is a solution. The possible solution is a design-and-build completion to the project that would cap the spending at £26 million. I was hoping that the hon. Gentleman might, in his intervention, give me a progress report about the months since I went to Bath on exactly how far they are down the road in agreeing that settlement. The important thing is, of course, that a settlement must not prejudice what the people of Bath get at the end of the day. At the moment, that is, as far as I can see, the only solution on the table.

Mr. Foster rose—

Nigel Griffiths: I am happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman if he will endorse that solution.

It being fifteen minutes to Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 10 March 2005

[MR. DAVID CHIDGEY in the Chair]

Working, Caring and Life Balance

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Vernon Coaker.]

2.30 pm

Mr. David Chidgey (in the Chair): Before the debate starts, I advise colleagues that we are expecting votes in the Chamber this afternoon, probably at about 4.30 pm. I am not yet aware how many votes there will be, but I propose to suspend the sitting when the Division bell first rings until 10 minutes after the last vote is called in the debate on the Irish issue.

The Deputy Minister for Women and Equality (Jacqui Smith): It is a pleasure to open today's debate, not least because it links in with international women's day and is therefore an appropriate topic for discussion. The inspirations for international women's day were the efforts of female American garment workers who staged protests against inhuman working conditions on 8 March 1857, and the women who in 1908 marched through New York demanding shorter working hours, better pay, the right to vote and an end to child labour. Although we have come a long way on many of those issues, women in the United Kingdom still have concerns about equal pay and working hours, particularly the balance between paid working hours and the even more precious, although unpaid, hours that we spend outside work caring for our families.

The challenge now is to ensure that women have real choices in their lives: the choice to be able to balance the demands of their family and their career; the choice to aim for challenging and fulfilling jobs if they wish rather than having to settle for lower-paid, lower-skilled jobs when they are capable of so much more; the choice of affordable quality child care, available when they need it most at times that fit in with their working patterns; and choice on who takes time out to care for children, because joint maternity leave and flexible working patterns allow us to share care between partners.

By giving women choice, we are also giving employers the choice of a wider spectrum of talent, skills and experience to employ, retain and develop to the full potential. At a time of intense global competition, with technological change and consumer demands in the private sector and the need to develop flexible, high-quality public services, we must make the most of everyone's talents. We need to do more to break down barriers in the labour market. By 2010, there will be an additional 2 million jobs in the UK economy, 80 per cent. of which will be filled by women. The UK will need to draw on all available sources of untapped economic potential to continue to grow and prosper.

Women's experiences in the workplace have changed over time. In the days of the first marches for women's rights in the mid-19th century, 30 to 40 per cent. of women were in employment, but half of them worked in domestic service, and most of the rest worked in horrendous conditions providing a flexible, cheap and adaptive work force for factories and sweatshops. Invention then played its part and, in the late 19th century, the typewriter gave women a new skill and a job outside the home. Then, during the first and second world wars, women working in factories as part of the war effort found themselves a place as active members of society.

The 1960s and 1970s heralded a new age in the fight for equality. However, the struggle was long and uphill. For example, up to the early 1970s, even in civil service departments, such as the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, women had to resign on marriage. Throughout the 1980s and 1990s, more women went out to work but, throughout the United Kingdom, mothers had to make stark choices: return to work early and miss out on arguably the most important first year of a child's life or stay at home with the children, but then face the difficult task of trying to re-enter the labour market at a later stage.

Maternity leave and pay were limited. Part-time employment opportunities were rare or available only in low-skilled, low-paid occupations. There were no benefits for fathers or adoptive parents and the term "flexible working patterns"—never mind the practice—was practically unheard of. That meant that, for many women, caring responsibilities rested firmly at their door impacting on their career progression, their pension rights and their pay.

What has changed? I am proud that, since 1997, the Government have introduced the biggest ever package of measures to balance work and family life. We are nearly doubling maternity pay and extending maternity leave. We are giving fathers paternity leave for the first time; we understand the important role that they play in the raising of their children. We are giving both parents of young or disabled children the right to request flexible working arrangements.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I support strongly what my right hon. Friend the Minister is saying about the benefits that have been introduced. Recently, the Equal Opportunities Commission in Wales carried out research among small and medium-sized businesses. It showed that those businesses have great difficulty in managing pregnancy and maternity leave in the workplace. The majority of businesses in Wales are small. Does my right hon. Friend have any comments to make about how small businesses can be helped to manage those rightly earned benefits that parents now have in the workplace?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend makes an important point. As we develop new provisions, we need to—as we did with the flexible working provisions—work alongside employers to make sure that, while we make change, we do so in a way that respects the burdens that may be placed on them.

My hon. Friend referred to the EOC's inquiry into pregnancy discrimination. However, we can do more to make sure not only that mothers understand their rights during pregnancy, but that employers understand their responsibilities. As we suggested in the working families consultation document to which I shall refer later, we could open up better routes for employers to communicate with mothers even during their maternity leave and perhaps gain more certainty about when people will return from maternity leave. That would be an important way in which to help employers to cope with what undoubtedly will be some disruption in their businesses. Employees must clearly understand, too, that, unless we can maintain decent working conditions and give women the opportunity to return to work after having children, that will disbenefit both mothers and businesses. There is a variety of ways in which we can make sure that the worries rightly raised by my hon. Friend are dealt with.

[Jacqui Smith]

I have emphasised that the way in which we have introduced flexible working legislation is not only about helping families to find solutions that fit their individual needs, but giving parents and employers the tools with which to work together to find solutions that will benefit all concerned. By all accounts, such a development was long overdue. In the first year of the legislation, nearly 1 million parents have changed their working hours in agreement with their employers to suit their family needs. That legislation has driven even further cultural change and change in practice, with seven out of 10 employers being willing to consider requests from employees for flexible working arrangements.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend explain the gender breakdown of the 1 million parents who are seeking flexible working arrangements? She may be aware of the research undertaken by the Fawcett Society, which shows that, unless we move further and faster towards encouraging fathers to take full advantage of such provisions, we may inadvertently end up trapping women even further in the double bind of combining employment and caring responsibilities. She has mentioned fathers, but could she say a little more about what we might be able to do ensure that it is not just women who have to carry the burden of the dual role?

Jacqui Smith: I shall come back to fathers later. Of the nearly 1 million parents who have gained from the first year of flexible legislation, the vast majority are mothers. It is often not fully understood that this right is open to both mothers and fathers. We need to do more to ensure that fathers are given support to enable them to take responsibility for caring. I agree with my hon. Friend that that is an important way in which we need to make progress.

I was going to touch on the benefits not just for families and children but for business from the ability to work more flexibly. If parents can remain in the work force, companies and businesses clearly benefit. They benefit from retaining key skills and experience. The company reduces its turnover. Absenteeism and recruitment costs are down too. The work force are more committed and contented, which in turn increases productivity. In the long run, more profitable companies mean a healthier economy and greater prosperity for us all.

There are more women in work today than ever before. More than 1 million women have found work since 1997. With 14 million now working in Britain, we have one of the highest female employment rates in the world, but we have also had to take action to ensure that work pays. Women are the biggest beneficiaries of the national minimum wage. They number around 1 million, and they will see it increase this October from £4.85 to more than £5.

Some 5.9 million families and low-income households are benefiting from the tax credits introduced in April 2003. Any family with children with an income of less than £58,000 will be eligible for some support. The lone parent employment rate stands at a record high: nearly 1 million and up nine percentage points since 1997, with 277,000 more in work than in 1997. We are committed to helping even more lone parents move into jobs through accessible tailored employment advice and the opportunity to gain skills.

Women are increasingly successful in business and in starting up their own businesses. There are now more women starting a business or becoming self-employed than ever before. There is more that we can do here too. That is why we have brought together successful women entrepreneurs to advise the Government on how we can reach our target of ensuring that one in five businesses is owned and run by women.

I was pleased on Tuesday to be able to host a reception at Lancaster house for women who had set up in business, those who support them and those who contribute to the national women's enterprise panel. It was—I hope that this is not an unparliamentary term—an extremely "buzzy" event. There was a lot of excitement and interest, and the commitment and enthusiasm that one finds from women who have started up and those who want to take that step into enterprise.

Despite the progress, there is still more that we need to do. Why is what has happened already not enough? It is not enough because we want to give every child the best start in life and to give parents and carers even more choice about how to balance their work and family life. It is not enough because we want to respond proactively to the changing work patterns and ensure that parents, particularly mothers, can meet their children's needs without sacrificing their future pay, pensions and career prospects. It is not enough because we have to acknowledge our changing demographics and accept that as people live longer, caring responsibilities change. In some families, mothers or fathers have to care for children at one end of the scale and for elderly or infirm relatives at the other. Broadening the criteria for flexible working could allow women and men with wider caring responsibilities the additional flexibility that they need.

That is why, last week, we launched our "Work and Families: Choice and Flexibility" consultation document. Our commitments outlined in that document will help us to deliver our vision for families, ensure that all children have the best start in life, respond to changing patterns of employment, and give parents more choice about how to balance work and family responsibilities. We want to hear first-hand from employers, employees, parents and carers on how we can get the detail right for the benefit of everyone.

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend not agree that the issue is important for everyone, because any of us could at some time find that a close relative is in need of care or assistance, through an unforeseen illness, accident or the like? These policies will provide help for everybody, not just those traditionally seen as carers—that is, women of a certain age with younger children—but, potentially, the whole population.

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The policies recognise that, increasingly, the ability to work flexibly and to have time off in emergencies is of significance, and not just to those with young children, but more broadly across society. That is how we ought to address the ideal of how we need to organise our working and our lives outside work.

At the heart of the progress that we need to make, according to the consultation document, is the fact that we do not want to force women to return to work because of financial constraints before they choose to do so. That is not good for them, their families or their children. We want maternity pay increased to nine months in the first instance, and to cover the whole 12-month period by the end of the next Parliament, but we also want to give families the choice to decide how care is best shared.

My hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) was right to emphasise the position of fathers, not only because of the care that they want to contribute, but because of the important message that that sends about caring being something that both genders do; it is not solely the responsibility of mothers. Fathers have told us that they want to play a greater role in bringing up their children, including during that crucial first year of a child's life. That is why we propose to make some of the extended maternity pay transferable to the father.

As I mentioned earlier, as a priority, we would like to extend the right to flexible working to those caring for elderly or sick relatives and older children. We estimate that there are around 5.3 million carers of working age, 3.5 million of whom both work full or part time and provide some form of unpaid care. Many carers struggle to balance their work and caring responsibilities, and often have to give up work altogether. Once that happens, many remain out of work for several years, and that makes it much harder for them to return to work later. Progress in that area would build on the action already taken through the national carers strategy, which was developed in 1999 with carers and the organisations that represent them.

The Government are committed to ensuring that good quality affordable and accessible child care is available to give those parents who wish to work, train or learn the opportunity to do so with the confidence that their children are being cared for in a safe and stimulating environment. It is clear that parents place their children first and want to be reassured that the provision that they are receiving is of the highest possible quality.

By 2010, if our plans go through, all families with children aged up to 14 who need it will have a child care place available for their children from 8 am to 6 pm all year round. That is not because many parents will want their children to be in child care from 8 am to 6 pm, but it is important that we develop more flexibility. On top of the 1.2 million extra child care places that have been created, we need to give flexibility to those whose children are in school, for example, for whom a bit of care before or after school can make a significant difference to whether and how they are able to work.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): This child care place from 8 am to 6 pm would have been useful when I was a working parent, but I am still unclear who will provide it. Are the teachers expected to provide some sort of supervision? This often happens on school premises. I have spoken to head teachers who are concerned about that and say that there needs to be some overall supervision. Is the plan to increase the number of child-carers in some other way? Will the Minister elaborate on how this will be achieved?

Jacqui Smith: I am sure that the hon. Lady has examples in her constituency, as I do in mine, of sensible partnerships between a school and child care providers—possibly publicly funded, and sometimes privately funded—using school facilities. This provision is not about extending the teaching day, but is about using the facilities that are often in schools in partnership with other child care providers to ensure that those opportunities exist in, or close to, schools or are offered by schools working together to provide them.

There will need to be further investment—if that is what the hon. Lady is pressing me on. We have been willing to put considerable investment into child care and are committed to further investment, as the Chancellor made clear in the pre-Budget report, to ensure that we can develop not only the places, but the flexibility that is available to parents.

I hope that all the measures will allow women the opportunity to choose to work, if they wish to, but there is a lot more work to be done to ensure that women get a fair deal once they get to work, which is why we set up the Women and Work Commission, under the chairmanship of Baroness Prosser of Battersea. The causes of the pay gap—which is at the heart of the work of the commission—are not simple and it is essential that we understand how to crack them.

The commission's work on the pay gap and the reasons why women fall into it are important. Women particularly fall into low-paid occupations. The commission produced its interim report this week and acknowledged the Government's commitment to gender equality and the high-profile debate on child care and work-life balance issues, but it lays down some challenges for us, too. One issue identified in the report is that the pay gap is often affected by the sectors in which women work, which are predominantly the five Cs—cleaning, catering, caring, cashiering and clerical work. The commission plans to consider the reasons behind that occupational segregation—not that those jobs are not important—so that we move away from women being concentrated in a small number of lower-paid occupations.

The commission will consider in more detail the reasons behind occupational segregation—why men and women do different jobs—female access to so-called male jobs and what happens to women in those jobs. I look forward to the commission's final report and the conclusions of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, to which I gave evidence earlier this week, which is carrying out an investigation into the link between occupational segregation and the pay gap. We welcome sound ideas on how the persistent issue of the gender pay gap can be tackled once and for all.

[Jacqui Smith]

This debate gives us an important opportunity to consider what more we need to do to give every child the best start.

Sandra Osborne (Ayr) (Lab): I welcome the Minister's comments on dealing with the pay gap, but does she share my surprise about the number of women in Great Britain who are still sacked for being pregnant and is she aware of the campaign by the Equal Opportunities Commission, which has published research showing that 30,000 working women are sacked, made redundant or leave their jobs every year due to pregnancy discrimination? What are her views on that and what can the Government do about it?

Jacqui Smith: I am aware of that research and I am pleased that the Equal Opportunities Commission has focused some of its attention on pregnancy discrimination. Two undesirable elements are at work here. First, in some cases there is outright discrimination against pregnant women—that is clearly discrimination under sex discrimination legislation. Secondly, there is sometimes a lack of understanding both by women of their rights during pregnancy and by employers of their responsibilities; that links in with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan). We welcome the EOC's interim report, and we have responded to some of the recommendations. I look forward to the publication of the final report, and especially to its recommendations on what more we can do to address these issues, and the unacceptable discrimination against pregnant women that has been identified by my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Sandra Osborne). We will look carefully at recommendations on those issues.

I would now like now to draw my remarks to a conclusion.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Jacqui Smith: I thought I might invite another intervention by saying that.

Mr. Drew: I missed the first couple of minutes of my right hon. Friend's speech, and I apologise for that. Would she care to say something about the voluntary sector, which we commend? Those who work in it—men, as well as women—who are not volunteers but who are paid for their work are often among those who are most discriminated against, in that people assume that they can work longer hours for less money and that they can make up for whatever time needs to be made up through their own volunteering. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as the voluntary sector grows, we must pay attention to that issue?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend is right that the voluntary sector makes a massive contribution—sometimes, of course, it makes it in areas such as child care and caring for others—and that both those who do paid work and those who do voluntary work within the sector make a massive contribution. We must address how we, as the Government, and how the public sector in general can provide not only better support but more coherence in our relationship with the voluntary sector, and thereby perhaps enable it to have more certainty of funding and greater ability to pay decent wages. That has been part of the work that has been developed through the compact initiative, as well as through a variety of other areas of work that the Government have done in looking at the important contribution made by the voluntary sector.

I was drawing my speech to a conclusion. I was saying that I hope that we will be able to consider in this debate how we can give every child the best start in life. How can we better support mothers and fathers, and give them real choices about how they balance their work and family life? How can we thereby support businesses by broadening the talent pool that is available, and by offering a wider choice of skills and experience? How, at the foundation of all of these endeavours, can we strive to create a future where everyone has the opportunity to maximise their potential?

2.58 pm

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to have an opportunity to participate in this important debate, which is in the same week as international women's day.

I welcome the Government's goal of providing 12 months' paid maternity leave by the end of the next Parliament, and in particular the proposals for a law to enable mothers to transfer part of their maternity leave and pay to fathers. That will help to give children the best start in life by providing parents with a choice about who wants or needs to be the main person looking after their new baby. It will also allow mothers to return to work earlier if that is required or what they wish to do. It also responds to the call by many fathers for them to be assisted to stay at home and care for their children in a way that is not generally possible.

This is a modern law that meets altered family patterns and gives greater equality to parents in the extremely important first months of their new child's life. More and more fathers want to play a greater role in those early years than their fathers were able to play. That can be enormously beneficial to the child. My right hon. Friend the Minister referred to the Department of Trade and Industry consultation document. It stated that when "fathers play a greater role in bringing up children, this can lead to strong, positive educational effects later on in the child's life".

Last summer, I visited Denmark on holiday and was delighted to meet up with an old work colleague. He had married a Danish woman some years ago. They settled in Copenhagen and had three children. As everyone knows, the level of support for families in Denmark is higher than in this country and has been for many years—as are its tax levels, which he was less encouraging about. However, he particularly prized the ability that he and his wife had to spread the available maternity leave between them. They could choose the arrangement that made sense to them in their circumstances. He was just about to go on four months' leave following the birth of their latest child.

The introduction in December 1999 of the entitlement to 13 weeks' parental leave per child—albeit unpaid—was an important move towards giving fathers the opportunity to spend time with their children while they are young. That was further strengthened in 2003, when the Government introduced two weeks' paid paternity leave. However, family patterns are changing and in no area of life could it be more important to give parents a real choice about how they manage all the family's needs: the need physically to care for a child; the need to earn a living; and, importantly, the need for both parents to form an emotional bond with their child and to take an active part in their child's life, particularly in those important early years.

The Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers recently launched a campaign on supporting parents and carers. It is concerned that many new mums are being driven back to work too early because they cannot afford to take their full statutory maternity leave. It undertook a national survey and found that 78 per cent. of new mothers would have liked more time off with their new babies, but they went back to work an average six weeks before their statutory maternity pay ran out.

Ms Buck: Does my hon. Friend agree that polling evidence conducted by other organisations confirms that parents rank the need for flexible working entitlements when their children are in their teenage years very highly? I am sure that that applies in relation to other groups, too. It is right that we lay the foundations in early years. However, does she agree that one of our most important next stages is to support families whose children are in that difficult transition period of entering secondary school?

Ms Munn: My hon. Friend rightly spots that I have concentrated so far on the early years, and I shall continue to do so. However, the years that she mentions are important and an equivalent of a Sure Start for teenagers has been suggested. It would recognise the difficult challenges that families face at that time and examine how we can support parents in dealing with them. I said that any of us might need to work flexibly because of various caring reasons, be they family, illness, or age and disability as our parents or partners get older. The flexibility argument is important throughout.

According to the USDAW survey, a number of mothers felt that they needed to go back to work for financial reasons. Two thirds of those who went back early did so because they could not afford to stay off. The union found that the average cost of taking 12 months off was £7,000—a sum that is beyond the means of many workers. That does not just apply to mothers: fathers face the same economic dilemma. Every father who was surveyed wanted more paid paternity leave. They simply could not afford to take extra unpaid to leave to spend time with the newborn child. The ability for parents to share parental leave between themselves will offer many fathers more opportunities to spend time with their children.

Of course, businesses, particularly small ones, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) noted, need to consider the effects on them of any changes to those rights. Many sectors of our economy rely on female workers—USDAW points directly to the retail sector—but with businesses getting at least 92 per cent. of the cost of statutory maternity pay from the Government, and with small businesses receiving more, cost should not be a major concern.

Research by the Equal Opportunities Commission shows that on average only 3 per cent. of any work force will be on maternity leave during a year. Last year, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Sandra Osborne) said, the commission reported that 30,000 women a year lose their jobs because of pregnancy. Women who are properly supported before and during maternity leave feel motivated to go back to work and to stay with the same employer, so there are benefits to businesses in well managed maternity leave. Retaining highly trained employees of both sexes is important in business, especially in today's economic climate, in which getting well trained staff is not always easy.

Again, we can look to the Scandinavian countries. We know that the provision of child care matters, but a child-friendly society also needs parent-friendly workplaces. There is evidence to show that family-friendly companies are more productive and economically successful. For example, Finland has achieved the enviable goal of becoming one of the most productive economies in the European Union, with high levels of female participation in the work force and the EU's highest birth rate. We spend a lot of time discussing the problem of pensions and how we will support an ageing population. We have a declining birth rate, and there is evidence to suggest that that is not a matter of choice for many families, but a matter of practicalities. By making it easier for families to manage work and home life, more will be able to choose to have the number of children that they want.

The key to many successful businesses is flexibility. Businesses that recognise that their staff have lives outside work are more likely to retain them. However, the issue is not just about economic success either for individual companies or for the country as a whole. Children are the future of communities. Britain is known for having a long-hours culture and for being a society that is not friendly to children. The proposals are an important step in changing that culture and our society. Recognising the individuality of families, work patterns, ages of children and existing support from extended family members, it is obvious that choice has to be central to supporting families in work. They are a key building block of our society, and a thriving economy enables not only families to have a good standard of living, but our society to afford the excellent public services on which we rely.

I welcome the publication of the DTI's consultation paper, aptly called "Choice and Flexibility", and I look forward to the aims becoming a reality for all families in Britain.

3.8 pm

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): This important debate takes place in the week of international women's day and very soon after mother's day. In Wales, we also have St. David's day on 1 March, so in my mind the three are mixed up together and symbolised by a daffodil. I do not know why, but that is how I see it. This is a week in which we traditionally consider issues relating to women and all aspects of their lives, and this debate concentrates on the important subject of working, caring and how we cope with doing everything while juggling different tasks, as women have to do every day of their lives.

[Julie Morgan]

Before I cover that in depth, I want briefly to say how much the Government's policies since 1997 have improved the situation for women, not only in terms of work and the work-life balance, but in the many areas that affect women's lives. I want to mention in particular the huge steps that we have made on domestic violence, which has a big impact on all women's lives. On 8 March—international women's day—I was pleased to take part in an international video conference with other women MPs. We spoke to African women MPs about their experience of domestic violence, and it was a thrilling occasion. We found that we had so much in common. The issues were the same, and the same is true of balancing our lives, work and caring duties. Those are international issues, and it is good to consider what happens in other countries, particularly the Scandinavian countries, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Ms Munn) said. Those themes are being addressed all over the world.

When I was a councillor, I used to work closely with women and children and tried to expand child care in my ward. I tried to do all that I could to help with the balance of care for mothers and children in particular. I always thought of a carer as a mother of small children, as I think my right hon. Friend the Minister mentioned. The Government have done an enormous amount to help mothers of small children. Many of the benefits have been mentioned, such as increased maternity pay and leave, and the right to choose flexible working. That is not enough, as I think we would all acknowledge, but we have taken tremendous steps. My own two daughters, who both have small children, returned to work after benefiting from the extra maternity pay and leave, but they also felt that it was too soon to go back.

Ms Buck: I do not know whether my hon. Friend has had a chance to see the reports in today's newspapers of a survey carried out by New Woman magazine, which implies that the younger generation of women are more fearful of a future in which they have to combine work and child rearing than were those of us who went through that in the not-too-distant past. Does she agree that one of the tasks that we face is to do more to make life easier for the next generation and that we must also convey the message that there has been a great deal of change in the delivery of child care, maternity provision and so on? There is an alarming lack of awareness of some of the rights and entitlements that exist.

Julie Morgan: I have not seen those reports, but my hon. Friend is right because mothers, particularly young mothers, think that the improved provision has always been in place. They do not recognise the huge leap forward that we have made since 1997. It is our job to make them realise how far we have gone and how far we plan to go. We know from what the Minister said that the Government plan to extend maternity leave and to do an awful lot more for people in that position. Increasing awareness is important.

Until fairly recently, I always regarded a carer as a mother of small children. I had not taken on board the problem of caring for elderly parents, but sometimes things suddenly become real and personal. That can happen overnight, as I think my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) said. Five years ago, my situation changed literally over the course of one night, and I shall talk about my experiences to illustrate the difficulties and opportunities that such an occurrence can mean for us in our working lives.

My mother had a massive stroke, which left her profoundly disabled. She was unable to walk or do anything for herself, so I became a carer overnight. The change in my mother was profound, because she went from being an elderly but still very active individual to someone who was totally dependent on others. She was unable to do anything without relying on our support. We in turn have had to rely on the wonderful support provided by the national health service. A tremendous number of queries have been raised about the NHS, but the support that we have received has been fantastic.

We also had to rely on the caring and voluntary bodies, which my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) mentioned. We have been very dependent on carers. I support what he said about carers in the voluntary sector. They need more recognition, as do the caring professions. By "caring", I mean the huge body of people, usually women, who come into people's homes and give individual personal care in a loving and responsible way that cannot be matched. That is my experience, so I strongly support what he said. Their pay is low. They need to be recognised and to get more money.

I was in my first term as an MP when my mother had her stroke and I could not contemplate giving up at that stage. I also knew that my mother would not have wanted me to because, throughout her life, she had always been a great fighter for the underprivileged. She had set up a school for Gypsy Traveller children and had taught children with learning difficulties. I knew that she would want to support me and would want my work as an MP to continue. Therefore, for five years I, like many other millions of carers in the UK, have been faced with the tremendous difficulty of juggling a demanding job with the need to ensure that my mother is cared for and that the rest of the family cope with the situation that I leave behind at home.

When I am in Westminster, I depend on a team of people—carers, family and friends—and I am in constant touch with them. I know that women in jobs are often in that situation. They are carrying out their job, but thinking about what is happening at home, and make quick phone calls home to see that everything is okay. That call used to be to ask, "Have the children gone to school?", but now, in my case, it is to ask, "Has the carer arrived on time?" or something similar.

We get used to dealing with working while our lives are on different levels. That is the reality and a huge stress for many millions of people in the UK. I often feel that I am in two places at once: I am in Westminster, but also at home managing what is going on there. I know that that is a common experience. The carers can phone me any time they want to, day or night, and I have had to go home in the middle of the night twice to cope with situations that they could not cope with. I suppose that I am lucky to be in this job, where there is some understanding of what we have to cope with as individuals and some flexibility that enables me not to have to be bound to a nine-to-five job in the way that many people are.

Carers, particularly those who care for elderly people, often have broken nights. When I am at home, I have to get up many times in the night to deal with my mother. People do that when they have small children—we automatically do it when we have small children, but we know that that will come to an end. However, the strain that carers of elderly people experience in having to get up so many times in a night must be recognised. There should be more help available for carers in the nights as well as in the days.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I appreciate the points that the hon. Lady makes, and she makes them well and from important personal experience. I have had a similar experience. Her point is important and often not recognised. There is an enormous emotional difference between being the carer of a small child who is happy, healthy, loving and lovable and who will grow up, and being the carer of an elderly parent whom the carer also loves, but whom they see degenerating before their eyes. The latter is much more difficult than the former and it is time that we as a society recognised that and gave the help and emotional support that is due.

Julie Morgan: I could not agree more. The first period of care—caring for young children—is a time of great hope, pleasure and enjoyment, but what most of us experience in the second period of care is much more of a strain. It may have its moments of hope and enjoyment, but it is very different from the earlier period. That should be recognised.

There are other things that carers commonly experience that we need to recognise and be understanding about, in particular the need to build in extra time before they can do anything. Again, it is a bit like taking out small children—we have to pack an extra bag, put the nappies in and make sure we have this and that. Many of us will have been through that. If the person being cared for is disabled and has to be moved into a wheelchair and the carer also has to ensure that they have everything ready before they go out, that requires extra time that other people do not need. It is sometimes quite difficult for society in general to understand that carers have to build in all those extra elements.

If, for example, I leave my mother at home and go to a meeting, my whole day is planned down to the last five minutes. I know that if I am delayed for five minutes anywhere, one of my carers will be kept five minutes beyond the time that she is supposed to leave. We fail to recognise such things until we experience them ourselves, and we then realise that we have to put that mass of arrangements in place to support us in doing the job that we want to do.

My first-hand experience of being a carer has made me both more informed about what so many people experience and more determined to work on issues of equality to ensure that carers of older people get the rights that we now give to carers of small children. We need to value the contribution that carers make to society. It is estimated that they save the state £57 billion a year. Most caring goes unrecognised because people do not have additional help but just get on with it because it is their normal duty in life to do so. We must recognise the huge amount of unpaid caring and the uncomplaining nature of that care—most people just do it. The more help that we offer, and the more that we recognise the care that is taking place, the better it will be for carers.

As a result of my experiences, I especially support the new Carers (Equal Opportunities) Act 2004, introduced by my Welsh colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis), who also has personal experience of caring. It gives carers the chance to have their opportunities for work considered. Many have to work and care at the same time, so the Act is a big step forward. I also welcome the fact that a new all-party parliamentary group on carers has been set up by my hon. Friend, and I have joined it.

I welcome the new EOC-ICM poll on parents and carers, which shows overwhelming support for improving provision for carers and for state pension rights for people not in paid work because they are carers. It also shows support for extending the right to request flexible working to all parents and carers, and I am encouraged by the Minister's comments on that subject.

Even if I was not a carer in my private life, I would still support such provisions for carers in my public life. However, being a carer means that I have a personal connection and an understanding born of experience. Support for carers will grow even more strongly when the public are more educated about what caring is and what help is available. Debates such as this one, which gives us an opportunity to explore some of the issues, are good for educating the public and ourselves on what caring is all about.

I very much welcome the debate, and I am glad that it has given me the opportunity to talk about some of my personal experiences. I have had the good fortune of having an interesting, demanding and stimulating job as well as being a carer, and I have had lots of help and support. Many other carers have not had that help and support, and their opportunities have sometimes been cut short because of the caring role. I hope that we move towards creating a society in which everyone has the opportunity to fulfil their full potential. That should be our aim, and I hope that carers will be part of that move forward.

3.23 pm

Sandra Osborne (Ayr) (Lab): I am delighted to take part in this celebration of international women's day, which we have had now for the past few years. I have celebrated the day for many years through my former involvement with Women's Aid, where I worked for 16 years. We used to have a party every year; the House of Commons has not got to that stage yet, but perhaps that will happen one of these days.

[Sandra Osborne]

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) referred to the progress made in the field of domestic violence. I applaud the Government, and also the Scottish Executive for the progress that they have made in Scotland. There is absolutely no doubt that that progress would never have been made without the work over the years of organisations such as Women's Aid, and I try to pay tribute to that work whenever possible.

I am pleased to take part in today's debate because it allows us to recognise the tremendous progress made in supporting parents and children and in accepting that women have the right to play their part in the public as well as the private sphere, where they still bear the overwhelming responsibility for caring. I acknowledge the very important part that women now play in the work force.

I want to concentrate particularly on child care, which is central to the mechanism for making a more realistic work-life balance. My hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) referred to a report in today's paper that suggested young women were even more fearful than our generation were. All I can say is that if I had had the facilities available to my daughter today, I would have thought that I had died and gone to heaven. The situation is completely different from what it was when I brought up my first child 30 years ago, and even from what it was when I brought up my second child 21 years ago. I pay tribute to the Government for that. That is due not just to Government policy, but to social attitudes, which have changed a great deal—thank goodness—since those days.

In 1990, the Equal Opportunities Commission report, "The Key to Real Choice: an Action Plan for Childcare", stated:

"Women cannot enjoy genuine equality of opportunity unless they have access to day care facilities for their children. The complete inadequacy of current provision for both the under fives and dependent school age children is now probably one of the most important factors restricting many women's opportunities."

Good child care, as we know, benefits children and brings with it many advantages for them.

For most of my adult life, I have been involved in campaigning for affordable child care in relation to equal rights for women. I make no apologies for that, and I am very proud of what has been achieved. As I said, the situation is very different from what we had in the past. From the 1980s and 1990s to the present day, child care has been quite a political issue, partly due to the need for increasing numbers of women in the work force and, of course, partly owing to changing family patterns. As has been said, the UK lagged for many years behind other European countries in the provision of child care and in parental rights legislation.

In 1992, the European Commission made recommendations on child care in four main areas: services for children; leave arrangements for parents; making the environment, structure and organisation of work responsive to the needs of workers with children; and promoting the sharing of responsibilities for children between men and women. Very little progress was made on all that until relatively recently, although we have a long way to go in all those areas.

Those recommendations reflected a desire for equal treatment for men and women, but also wider economic concern about the need for women in the work force. Hon. Members may or may not be surprised to learn that, in the west of Scotland, females will hold up to 53 per cent. of all employee jobs by 2010. We will be not only the majority of the population, but the majority of the working population. If that is increasingly to happen, and it would appear that the trend is unlikely to go into reverse, we must ensure that women's place in the work force is fair and equal, and not on a basis of exploitation of women, as has been the case in the past, when they were totally undervalued, in both the public and private spheres. Progress can be sustained only by efforts to reconcile work and family life, and I very much welcome the measures that the Government are taking in that regard.

For far too long, women who have chosen to fulfil a different or additional role, or who, more realistically, have had to work as an economic necessity, have had to find ways to juggle all their responsibilities, including having to make some kind of child care arrangement in the absence of Government support. We need to consider the concerns associated with the inadequate child care provision that we have had for many years, as they affect individual parents and children.

I carried out some research into child care provision while I worked with Women's Aid. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North, I feel that we can learn a lot from the experiences of individual women and carers. I would therefore like to quote from my research into the case of a woman who came to the refuge that I worked at in Kilmarnock.

"Isabelle is 35 and has two children aged 9 and aged 5. She left her husband three and a half years ago due to physical, sexual and mental abuse, which had started on the second day of marriage and had escalated through the years. The attacks were also being witnessed by the children and they themselves were being abused. She had no family support in any real sense. When Isabelle left she went to Women's Aid who gave her refuge, space and support. She received income support, which seemed wonderful, as she had no idea whether or not she would receive anything and she frequently was given no money at all by her husband.

During the time in the refuge she had a job as a barmaid to earn money to save up for furniture for her new home. She did swaps with the other women in the refuge for child care. When she moved to her new home she advertised for a babysitter close to her flat. After a time she arranged a swap again with a neighbour who worked in a school. She watched the neighbour's four children and made their meal two evenings a week and the neighbour watched her two children in return. This arrangement was very stressful for her and the children. She also did another swap with a neighbour who she gave driving lessons to in return for babysitting. This fell through when she found the neighbour was inviting eight adults into her house while she was out, including people who had been charged with grievous bodily harm.

She then resolved to find a reliable babysitter and managed to do this, but the cost involved was prohibitive, and she could not afford it with the jobs she was doing: bar work, cleaning for an elderly woman and survey work for a magazine. She was forced to give up the jobs and this led to depression. She took in ironing to supplement her income support. She studied at home with the Open university and gave her place up at Glasgow university due to lack of child care. Isabelle wanted to work because she did not feel in control on income support, given changes at that time in Government legislation. She was also depressed at the idea of living on benefit long-term: 'If you try to earn extra money you are in fear of someone phoning the DSS.' She also feels that work 'keeps me sane'. Although she is sometimes not much better off financially she feels better about herself and her family, especially since she has taken her children from an earning income. Her husband was an architect and earned a lot of money.

When she first started work she was paying up to half her wages to child care. This was reduced when her youngest child started school, but is still a hefty bill. Isabelle states that she could not afford to work if she did not earn her current salary and did not have her current working conditions. Isabelle believes that her current child care arrangements will fill a caring role for her children when she is not with them. They have a mother figure who was carefully chosen because of her qualities and chosen for what she could offer in place of Isabelle—secure, home-based caring.

When she took full-time work she considered the whole position including the plus and minus effect on the children. The children have responded well to the child care arrangements. They are used to their mother working, mix with other children in the same position as themselves and regard it as normal. She anticipates future problems when the children are older and child minding is not appropriate but feels she will have to work that out as it comes along.

Isabelle has strong views about the lack of affordable child-care facilities and described it as a huge obstacle for creating change in her own life or her family's. Lone parents require help in practical ways in Isabelle's view and also support, as society criticises whatever lone parents do. 'If they go out to work they are neglecting their children and this is the cause of all violence etc. in society and if they don't they are too lazy to get out there and earn a living.'"

I have concentrated on Isabelle's story because it is illustrative of many of the situations in which people have found themselves. The prohibitive cost of child care, the reliance on informal—often far from ideal—arrangements, the role of child care in alleviating poverty and creating opportunities for women to work and study, the importance of state funding to child care, the stress caused by a lack of suitable child care arrangements and the persistence of gender divisions that place an unfair burden on women all point to the central importance of child care provision on working, caring and life balance that we are debating today.

That research was undertaken in 1992. We have come a long way. Isabelle's story would be far different today from what it was then. It is incredible to think that it is only in recent years that anything even approaching a coherent national child care strategy has been developed. For many years, child care in the United Kingdom, unlike in many of our European partners, remained significant by its absence. In 1992, Germany, France, Italy, Belgium, Greece and Spain had at least 70 per cent. publicly funded child care services for children from three years of age to compulsory school age. It has taken the return of a Labour Government to make nursery places available at last, first for four-year-olds and now for three-year-olds.

For many parents, especially lone parents, the main obstacle to returning to the labour market has been the poverty trap. Despite propaganda to the contrary, and as I have illustrated by Isabelle's story, the overwhelming majority of lone parents want to reverse the trend of living on benefits and want to take part in the new deal. Lack of affordable child care is a major obstacle to doing that. Lone parents and unemployed parents, in general, are not in the position to take advantage of any growth in private sector child care and child minding services unless they receive financial support. Their absence from the labour market reduces their skills, confidence and earning potential. The benefits system in the past has not assisted such groups to return to work, and the real problems that are associated with the poverty trap were not addressed.

The tax credit system has changed the position and has been a tremendous boost in making work pay, along with the national minimum wage and increased child care and parental rights. A report by the Institute for Public Policy Research, as far back as 1991, showed that up to half all under-fives could be taken out of poverty if the provision of child care enabled their mothers to work and to improve their earnings. Many more could be taken out of poverty if those provisions were combined with reform of the tax and benefits system. Unfortunately, the Government at the time were not listening, but we can be proud of the progress that has been made under the present Government.

It is also relevant to note that changes in the benefit system to allow unemployed parents to seek a return to work without the burden of crippling child care costs save the Exchequer money through increased public revenue from income tax and national insurance contributions, as well as savings in benefits payments. It is a win-win situation all round, as long as women are fairly represented in the work force and rights are available to allow them the balance in their lives that we all deserve and to which we all have a right.

3.38 pm

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I welcome the chance to debate these issues. It is a shame that no one told the Leader of the House that the debate was in honour of international women's day. Last week in business questions I asked why there was not such a debate on the Floor of the House, and the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have overlooked the matter, which is a little unfortunate.

It is important to acknowledge that working conditions for women have improved immeasurably and that child care provision has come a long way since the '70s. During that time, Shirley Conran tried to convince women that they could be superwoman, and there was much talk about having it all, but even then she realised that life was too short to stuff a mushroom so, clearly, we could not quite have it all. Realisation slowly dawned on women that that was not a useful role model, because it was a daunting prospect for many of them.

Shirley Conran set up the Work-Life Balance Trust, the aim of which was to raise the profile of the work-life balance concept. I clicked on the website to find out where that organisation thought it had got on that matter, and apparently those involved have taken a sabbatical because they feel that they have achieved their aim and want a break to preserve their own work-life balance, which is slightly bizarre.

This subject is higher on the agenda, but sometimes too much lip service is paid to it and not enough real work is done to address the practical problems. The work-life balance affects men and women, but all too often it is regarded as a women's issue, which is regrettable.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove): Does not the attendance in the Room reflect what the hon. Lady said? We pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) for supporting us—[Interruption.]—and the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew).

Sandra Gidley: Absolutely, and I am glad that the hon. Lady noticed the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), too.

It is difficult for women to juggle home, work, children, elderly parents and the rest of it, but that subject has, to some extent, been done to death. There are different pressures on men. The pressure to perform in the workplace and the culture of many workplaces often means that men are forced to spend time at work when they would like to spend more time with their families. We should not forget that, or forget that the image is often that carers are female. However, many carers are male.

Ms Buck: Is it not also the case that even given the choice, or a balance of working responsibilities, many men—possibly due to millennia of conditioning—have a ingrained reluctance to empty the washing machine and get to grips with the vacuum cleaner?

Mr. Drew: It is innate.

Ms Buck: It is sadly true that women have a disproportionate role in domestic responsibilities. This is not a party political point. Perhaps the hon. Lady could reflect on how we can ensure that our sons, brothers, lovers and husbands feel that playing a full role in the domestic environment may be of value and benefit to them, and is essential to a proper work-life balance for women.

Sandra Gidley: That is interesting, because my husband is an engineer, but he struggles to get to grips with the washing machine, which is not difficult. But he has to get to grips with it now, because I went on strike. The New Woman survey that hon. Members mentioned also showed that the amount of house care responsibilities taken on by men is the same today as it was 30 or 40 years ago. There is some way to go.

Work-life balance is a problem for society. Another factor is the materialistic nature of our society. People want a lot of things, but often lose sight of what might be really important. I acknowledge that the Government have taken some welcome steps to try to improve matters, and flexible working is one such step. It was said earlier that the take-up is much higher among women than men, by a considerable degree—about 10 per cent.—and I am interested in whether the Government have undertaken any research to find out why that may be so. I welcome the consultation on extending the right to carers, but the problem with all consultations arises if the response from the workplace is that the measures will be difficult and will create an added burden.

A couple of weeks ago, I visited some small businesses in my constituency and time after time, sadly, they mentioned the burden of trying to provide maternity leave and paying for cover. This measure will, perhaps, create another burden, but at the same time there is an acknowledgement that small businesses are often quicker and better at finding creative ways around this problem. Will the Minister comment on how the interests of the business community can be balanced with a popular move for carers?

A second work-life balance study threw up a number of tensions. It found that 95 per cent. of employees considered that people work their best when they are able to balance work and other aspects of their lives, which is hardly surprising, and 57 per cent. strongly agreed with that. Some 78 per cent. agreed that everyone should be able to balance their work and home lives in the way that they want. There are no surprises there, but 60 per cent. agreed that they should not expect to be able to change their working pattern if to do so would disrupt business. That could be interpreted as a responsible attitude, but to me such quick acceptance of excuses provides business with a ready made cop-out that is all too likely to be accepted. There is no imperative to rethink flexible ways of working.

Even more worryingly, the study found that more than a half of fathers felt that working fewer hours would be likely to have a negative impact on their job security. Working fewer hours was also regarded as having a negative impact on career prospects.

Ms Munn: I am interested in what the hon. Lady is saying. It illustrates the problem that we have with the long-hours culture in this country in which someone's contribution is so often judged on how long they are somewhere rather than what they produce. Other countries that have shorter hours than us actually have higher productivity.

Sandra Gidley: That is a good point. The situation is not all negative, and I will speak about the attitude of employers in a minute. However, it concerns me that as a country we seem to have longer working hours than many others. As has already been said, many of the companies that address the problems and think hard about flexible working patterns reap the benefits financially. There can be a win-win situation.

The study also found that more than a third still think that taking leave to look after children could have a negative impact on their career prospects, and we have to think very hard about that if we are to extend the period of maternity leave. The study looked at employers separately. There was almost as high a level of support on flexible working, but nearly two thirds of employees agreed that trying to accommodate employees with different work patterns was not always easy, although, reassuringly, more than three quarters did not see flexible working as a barrier to promotion. We need to highlight that fact some more.

The Equal Opportunities Commission has done some good work in highlighting areas of good practice. For example, the RAC has seen productivity increase by 8 per cent. by allowing its staff to work their annual hours flexibly, while HSBC bank has trebled the number of women returning to work after having babies, which has saved it £1 million in training costs.

I want to spend some of my time talking about carers. It is right that the "Choice and Flexibility" document addressed that issue, but disappointing in some ways that it formed such a small part of the document, and what was there seemed to be more about finding a definition of a carer than giving a clear commitment to flexible working for carers. Again, the Equal Opportunities Commission has long been campaigning on the issue, and it has highlighted a number of facts. For example, at any one time, one in seven of the UK work force is juggling paid work with caring for someone who is ill, frail or has a disability. More than 300,000 people take on a new caring responsibility each year—that does not include people having babies—and 42 per cent. of all carers of older and disabled people are men.

One survey found that seven out of 10 carers under 50 and eight out of 10 of those aged 50 to 60 had given up work to care. The nature of caring responsibilities is that there is often an end to them but the added problem of age discrimination in the workplace means that many of the carers who give up their jobs do not find it easy to get a new one. The Minister alluded to that point earlier, and it would be useful if she could expand on how that problem will be tackled. I am afraid to say also that there is an anomaly in the fact that parents can claim working tax credit if they work 16 or more hours a week but carers of disabled or older adult relatives are eligible only if they work at least 30 hours a week. It would be useful to have an indication of whether there are any plans to deal with that disparity.

Work-life balance for carers is not all about what can be done in the workplace. We have to think about how carers are catered for outside the workplace. Half of all people who spend 20 hours a week caring do not have a paid job. There are 360,000 children with a disability, of whom 98 per cent. are cared for at home. It is probably useful to touch on the subject of young carers at this point. Estimates suggest that 150,000 children and young people spend time caring for a chronically sick or disabled parent. Carers have a legal entitlement to an assessment, but in 2002 a survey showed that only one quarter of carers had received one. Even worse, of those carers who cared for more than 50 hours a week, 70 per cent. had not received an assessment.

Julie Morgan: Is the hon. Lady aware of the different carers groups that have been set up throughout the UK, mainly, certainly in Wales, by voluntary bodies, such as Barndardo's? They seek to give young carers the support of sharing their situation with each other and the opportunity to have some childhood experiences.

Sandra Gidley: Yes, I am aware of that. The young carers initiative has a national rally at Fairthorne manor, fairly close to me. The county council and various other organisations are doing a lot of work to try to put young carers in touch with each other so that there is mutual support. However, there are still some problems inherent in the system. The provision is very patchy across the country.

In many cases, carers want to help but feel ill equipped to do so. Some 70 per cent. reported that no one had asked them whether they could cope when the person they cared for was discharged from hospital and only one third of those caring for more than eight hours a day had received any training or guidance on the use of medication, dressings or injections. Three quarters of people receiving care from a carer in the same household receive no regular visits from a professional such as a doctor, district nurse or social worker. Carers are, quite simply, left to get on with it. I am delighted that the hon. Lady had a more positive experience, but I suggest that it is probably not the norm.

Carers are no different from other people: they do not want to ask for help, because it is seen as a sign that they are not coping very well. There is a sense of pride in getting on with the job and not being seen to ask for help. The contribution of carers saves the taxpayer some £34 billion a year, but many people ultimately have to give up. One of the factors that contributes to that is the lack of respite care and the relentlessness of having to cope day in, day out. That desperately needs to be addressed by the Government if the aim to look after more people at home is to be fully realised. Many carers say that if they knew that they could have regular break, they could cope in the longer term because it would give them some time to themselves. However, respite care is not easy to access. Carers of disabled children may be able to rely on the help and support of a children's hospice. It is a shame that children's hospices are not as well funded as hospices for adults.

Carers of older people struggle to obtain a respite. They may be able to get a week when they go on holiday, but it would be far more helpful if they could have a regular few days every two or three months. There are some schemes around the country that mean that that has started to happen. The carer knows that the person being cared for always has the same nursing or residential home, and a relationship is built up between that home, the carer and the person being cared for. That is positive, but many areas say that they lack the resources to do that.

Young carers face slightly different problems. Often the reluctance to ask for help comes from the parents, who are often concerned that asking for help will highlight problems in the home and that the children may be taken away. We need to do more to reassure those parents that that is not what this is about; that it is about providing some help. In the meantime, the child may be struggling to cope and getting into trouble at school for being late or not completing homework.

The Government have begun to tackle the issues related to child care. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Ms Munn) mentioned the USDAW report that said that women were returning to the workplace on average six weeks before their statutory maternity pay ran out. They said that they did this because they could not afford to stay at home. For that reason, the Liberal Democrats have taken a different approach to maternity leave. It has long been our policy to advocate that benefits should be transferable between mother and father but we recognise that the present level of benefit is inadequate. I want to pay tribute to the Government for doubling it during their term in office; it is only fair to acknowledge that. We would prefer to offer a maternity income guarantee on the level of the minimum income guarantee so that those women who are returning to work early could afford to stay at home. When it comes to rewarding carers, we believe that our plans for a citizen's pension that is payable on the basis of residency, rather than national insurance contributions, is fairer because it gives the message that the caring contribution is of just as much value as any contribution from the workplace.

The other report out today that has already been mentioned is the report in New Woman. The headline was "Desperate to be housewives: young women yearn for 1950s role as stay at home mums." I cannot quite believe this somehow, but the magazine says:

"the average 29 year old now hankers for a return to the lifestyle of a 1950s housewife. The daughters of the 'Cosmo' generation of feminists want nothing more than a happy marriage and domestic bliss in the countryside".

[Sandra Gidley]

Would that life were so easy. A total of 1,500 women were surveyed, and 61 per cent. believe that domestic goddess role models are unhelpful and irritating. I am not 29, and I agree that such role models are unhelpful and irritating. Margi Conklin, the editor of New Woman, states:

"There has been a fundamental shift in young women's attitudes towards life and work. They've watched their own mothers trying and often failing to have it all and have decided they don't want it all. They don't want to work crazy hours while their children are put into nurseries and their relationships disintegrate under the strain... Young women today are increasingly putting their personal happiness before a big salary or a high powered career. Above everything else they crave a work-life balance where they can enjoy a fulfilling relationship, raise happy children and have a job that interests them but doesn't overwhelm them. The age of the superwoman who wants to be the world's best mother, wife and boss, is dead."

Earlier today, it was said that that situation arose because we were not selling the benefits of child care enough. That is not all that it is because the women saying these things have experienced mothers going out to full-time work and have realised that they do not want to spend all of their time in the workplace. They would probably welcome flexible working, and it is important that we develop it, but they have realised that there are ways—

Sandra Osborne: I am sure that both of my daughters would prefer a better work-life balance than I, as their mother, have had, having been involved in so many things. Would the hon. Lady agree that this vision of the 1950s woman is a myth, and a very idealised myth at that? It was not the reality of most women's lives.

Sandra Gidley: The 1950s argument is taken a bit far because during the 1950s it was very unusual for women to work, and they struggled to do so. I think that young women value the idea of some contribution in the work place and want some income of their own and some independence. They do not want to return to the 1950s, but they do not want to replicate what their mothers did and spend a lot of time away from home and family.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I have some personal experience of the 1950s when I was in a co-educational grammar school, and I can recall male teachers saying to girl students that it did not really matter if they did not understand something because they were only going to get married and have children anyway. I recall that the only career advice that the girls were ever given was when they were all herded into the hall and the headmistress said that there were only two respectable occupations for girls: nursing and teaching. She said, "Nurses over there, teachers over there." That was the sum total of career advice. When I first went to work in the late 1950s in a bank—before the Equal Pay Act 1963—women were considered to be temporary employees. Even if they never married, had that delightful title "spinster" and stayed in that job all their working lives, they were still only temporary employees and were on a lower pay scale. If anyone closely examined the 1950s, I do not think that they would want to go back to that time.

Sandra Gidley: I absolutely agree, and it is clear, after talking to women who lived through that time, that they almost envy what women have these days. However, we can do better to provide a work-life balance.

I am not sure whether it would be in order to talk about this, but one other aspect of the report caught my eye: some work by the Kinsey Institute. Many hon. Members will know what it studies. It came up with a quite alarming fact that the average married woman with young children "makes love"—I think those were the words—to her husband less frequently these days than 30 years ago. We must aim at a system in which women and men can choose the pattern of working and child care that does not tire them out, so that we can improve on the 1950s.

4.1 pm

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I am sure that we can improve on the 1950s. I welcome this debate today on working, caring and life balance. Until the Minister mentioned it in her opening remarks, I did not realise that the debate was connected with international women's day. I had wondered—although I had not got round to asking her—why, in the week of international women's day, we had not had a debate on women in Government time, which we have had in recent years. We have all enjoyed them tremendously. I knew about this debate today, but I had not made the connection because, in all honesty, it seems to me that working, caring and life balance is not just a women's issue, but one that affects everybody, from all walks of life, all sections of society, both sexes, all age groups and all parts of the country.

It is, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) pointed out, remarkable that the Chamber today has been so dominated by female Members of the House, although I certainly pay my compliments to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew)—he is no longer in his place, but I do not wish to cast aspersions on him as we were very pleased to welcome him here—and to my hon. Friends the Members for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) and for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), who is also no longer in his place.

I welcome the debate and hope that we can talk about issues, which, although they affect the whole of society, probably affect more women's lives than men's. That is a fact that I do not imagine will change in the foreseeable future, and we must stop pretending that it will change and deal with it. We must get round it somehow or other. I was pleased to hear the Minister speak so often in her opening remarks about choice. Choice is the Conservatives' watchword, and I am really pleased to hear the Labour Government adopting choice as the key to making progress on the issue that we are discussing.

I agree with the Minister's basic approach on most of the issues under discussion, and her historical overview was excellent. We have come a long way, as we see if we think of the way in which women had to fight only 100 years ago. I am talking about the grandmothers of many of us in this Chamber, people whom we knew in our early years, not about people from way back in the past. Those women had to fight to be listened to at all. They had to fight to get the vote and to have the woman's point of view even considered. I am not suggesting for a moment that we can stop that struggle now, but we have come a long way.

I have been thinking, as I often do, that I have had far more opportunities in my life than my mother had during hers—although she had a perfectly happy, satisfactory life—and that her mother had fewer opportunities than she did. I was shocked to see the survey in today's papers mentioned by the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) and others. The headline in The Times is "Superwoman crashes to earth". One lady is quoted as saying, "I run the house"—that is not our House; presumably she means her domestic residence. She says:

"I run the house and I could not be happier".

Well, that is okay for her.

Ms Munn: I am a little concerned that we may be generalising about women because of one survey. Might it not be the case that real superwomen do not have time to read New Woman?

Mrs. Laing: Not for the first time, the hon. Lady is right. I had not had time to read it either.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): That does not make you a superwoman.

Mrs. Laing: That is certainly true, but I do not try to be. The quote is:

"I run the house and I could not be happier".

That is from a sample of one. It is very nice for the lady who is quoted in The Times—very nice indeed. She appears to have a happy marriage and two happy, healthy primary school-age children, and clearly her husband earns enough to make it possible for her not to work. That is a nice sample of one if someone comes into that category, but most women and most families do not.

It is interesting to think, as the article says:

"THE feminist dream of 'having it all' has turned sour for the current generation of young women, who are determined never to work as hard as their mothers."

The average age of the women interviewed for the survey was 29. I have to say, without being in any way patronising, that when I was 29, I thought that I could do amazing things, but, now that I am not 29 any more, I am quite glad that I have not managed to do them. Of course, that is not true in all cases. Let us imagine a time when those 29-year-olds have a family to care for, either their children or, possibly, their parents who are declining in health. They may find themselves in circumstances of adversity. Let us suppose that they start bringing up their children with a husband or partner, and the husband or partner dies, becomes ill or leaves. It will not be so simple then to say, "I don't want to work as hard as my mother did."

I am glad that I can say that I do not have to work like my grandmother had to. I am glad, and so would she be, that the things that, indeed, both my grandmothers did in their time have enabled me to do what I do and not to live the kind of life that they led. However happy they may have been individually, their generation did not have the opportunities that we have.

Ms Buck: Does the hon. Lady agree that if we were to give a pound each for every time that we have seen one of those "Superwoman bites the dust" headlines, we could probably buy out the red nose appeal? Does she also agree that the issue is not really the have-it-all slogan, which is lampooned in those headlines, but the fact that women are anxious about having to do it all? I suspect that she agrees with much of this. Much of the debate has been about how we find ways to make that struggle easier for women who are expected both to work—often, as she says, out of sheer necessity, but sometimes through choice—and to carry a disproportionate share of the caring and domestic responsibilities. All of us—employers, the Government and individuals alike—have an interest in finding a way of reducing that pressure for today's carers and future generations of them.

Mrs. Laing: I agree entirely with the hon. Lady. What she said was totally correct. From now on, I shall try to be more adversarial so that we can prove that a debate in Westminster Hall entirely populated by women has the cut and thrust of serious political debate. Our debate should have such cut and thrust, and I shall find a reason to disagree with Members here from opposing parties in just a moment.

There is a lot of consensus between us because we all recognise the difficulties and we want to solve them. This political issue is not about which side says, "This does not matter" and the other that says, "It does". We all recognise that this issue is important, and there are two reasons for that. First, we want the right thing to be done: women should have equal opportunities to men—we agree with that altruistically nowadays. However, we also need to achieve the right work-life balance, because society and the economy require it.

If we say that women should either work or look after children, we will lose an enormous percentage of the work force whom we, as an economy, cannot afford to lose. On the other hand, if we say that if women work, they should not have children—something that we now think a ridiculous proposition, although that was not the case not so long ago—we will not produce the future generations that our society and economy require. It is essential to achieve the balance that we have all been talking about. We do that by accepting that flexibility in the workplace is not a luxury, but a necessity. It is an economic necessity that the work that women do should receive decent financial reward.

I emphasise, as did the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), that we are not talking only about mothers with young children. I have noticed a bit of a backlash in some academic studies and articles in the past couple of years. Women who do not have young children are saying, "Just a minute. If there are three women in my office, the two with young children get all the flexibility, privileges and help—maternity leave, flexible working and so on. I do not." Just because a person has chosen not to have children, or cannot have them, that does not mean that they should not be treated with respect in the workplace.

[Mrs. Laing]

We have to be careful about that and recognise that anyone with a family responsibility of any kind—for young children, teenage children or a sick or elderly relative—whether temporary or long-term, requires understanding in the workplace. All employers should be encouraged to do what the best employers have always done. The CBI agrees that employers get the best out of their employees if they have good working conditions, and that includes an understanding of the time needed for family responsibilities.

Such issues are not peripheral, but absolutely basic to the future of our economy and society. We now spend taxpayers' money and the nation's resources on educating young women and men equally, and on giving girls and boys the same education at school and the same opportunities in higher education. I completely welcome that. All Governments in the past 30 years have been striving for that goal and have achieved it. However, it is ridiculous that we now do all those things, yet when a woman with the same educational and training qualifications as a man becomes pregnant and has a baby, suddenly her talents and abilities are not worth the same as a man's because the employer does not put her in the same category any more; he sees her as a bit of a problem because she has children. That is nonsense. We are beginning to get over it, and what has, to an extent, been a consensus in this debate might possibly help in the future.

As to child care, fathers should of course be encouraged and enabled to care for their children, and employers must recognise that, too. The position of new fathers alongside that of new mothers is important. However, I heard an argument recently, which has been mentioned in the debate, that we will not improve the position of women as regards child care for young children until men become fully involved in that child care. I am sorry, but I am not very optimistic about that. We cannot legislate to make a man look after his children, or to make a man know what to do with a small baby. Somehow, miraculously, a woman who has just become a mother knows what to do with a baby, or learns very quickly, because there is no choice; she has just got to. A man does not. I do not believe that a man, even with the very best of intentions, looks after a tiny baby in the same way as the baby's mother or, indeed, its grandmother.

I do not suggest for a moment that men should not be encouraged to be very much involved in the early years of their children's lives; of course they should. However, we will not improve the position of women by depending on men changing their attitudes and behaviour in a domestic setting. Indeed, I think the hon. Member for Ayr (Sandra Osborne) said that men undertake the same percentage of household duties now as they did 30 years ago. That progress has not been made, but it might be. We will keep trying to make progress, but we cannot depend upon it. We therefore need to ensure that there are proper support systems for mothers who also work. That means having good child care facilities.

Ms Munn: The hon. Lady is painting rather a gloomy picture. The evidence of the USDAW survey is that men's desire to spend more time with their children is increasing and that, generally, younger men recognise the benefits of greater involvement with their families. The issue of how much housework is done may be slightly more problematical, although I would like to defend my husband, who knows where the washing machine is—and the microwave. Things are starting to change, and we should not be too negative about men's involvement in their families.

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Lady is right; I do not disagree with her. Things are improving tremendously. I do not think my father knew what a washing machine was but he expected clean shirts, and always had them. I am not saying that things are not improving and that we do not want them to improve; I am saying that we cannot depend on changing men's attitudes and behaviour in order to improve the position of women. We must take other steps to improve the position of women.

Ms Buck: That is an important point. I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Ms Munn) that there is a world of difference between a microwave and a vacuum cleaner. It is important in terms of household management.

The central point is that the Fawcett Society research, which we all accept is one piece of research among many, shows that women in full-time employment still spend 30 per cent. more of their time on child care responsibilities than men in full-time employment. Unless we progress significantly further and move faster, which would require a broad consensus inside and outside Parliament, we might entrench the disadvantage that women have in trying to cope with work as well as domestic and family responsibilities. We need to be alert to that risk; otherwise the very people everyone here is committed to helping could end up in a worse position.

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Lady is absolutely right, so I am going to make a serious political debating point. People are working longer hours than if not ever before, then certainly than before. The average family—therefore the average man—has to work far longer hours to pay the £5,000 a year of extra tax that the average family has been paying under this Labour Government for the past eight years. That is true; if more tax has to be paid, more hours have to be worked. If there is a choice between who stays at home and who works, the man will do extra work. If the tax burden were less, men would not have to work as long outside the home and would be able to spend more time caring for their children. That is a logical point.

Ms Buck: I am delighted to rise to the adversarial challenge. Does the hon. Lady agree that we must stop treating tax always and inevitably as a burden? Part of the reason that we require people to contribute tax is to fund many ambitious programmes, including the creation of 1 million child care places since 1997. It is essential that we do not view one side of the situation as 100 per cent. negative and the other as 100 per cent. positive; otherwise we will never get agreement on the investment argument for these necessary services.

Mrs. Laing: Again, the hon. Lady is absolutely factually correct, so let me tell her that for every two child care places that the Government have created, one rights in the mid-19th century, 30 to 40 per cent. of responsibilities. As we suggested in the working families has shut. There are more child care places in some child care settings, but there are fewer in others. The Government's record of improving the availability and affordability of child care is simply not good enough. We need flexibility and choice—[Interruption.] We are getting some adversarial debate now, but I will give way first to my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson).

Angela Watkinson: In the drive to provide more child care places, does my hon. Friend agree that we must not focus entirely on quantity, eligibility and cost for the convenience of women going out to work, either by choice or out of financial necessity? We must also focus on the quality of child care, not only the benefits to the parents, but the benefits to the child. Child care should not be warm storage with lunch, with the child left and collected at the end of the day. What happens to the children and how they benefit during child care is equally, or even more, important.

Mrs. Laing: I agree entirely, which is why I am worried about the Government's policy of making schools available from 8 am to 6 pm being a major part of their child care strategy. In some cases, that is a good idea, but it is not a universal panacea for the provision of child care. It is worrying that a child might leave the family home at 7.30 in the morning and come back at 6.30 in the evening having not had any positive educational or social benefit in between.

Sandra Osborne: I hesitate to return the hon. Lady's adversarial comments, because she is making an excellent speech, with much of which I agree. Does she recall, however, the example I gave of my friend Isabelle, who worked in three low-paid jobs before the introduction of the national minimum wage to make ends meet while bringing up two children? That beats the hon. Lady's example of the hard-working man who has to work harder because of higher taxes under a Labour Government. If the hon. Lady thinks child care is so important, why did her Government not do anything about it?

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Lady's example is a good one, and she is right that the position of the lady she mentions is far worse than that of most men who have to work harder to pay Labour's higher taxes. The Government to whom the hon. Lady refers were not my Government, but the next Government will be, in eight weeks' time, and we will see some changes then.

Ms Munn: When Labour came to power, only extremely patchy child care provision existed. Child minders were almost non-existent in some of the poorest communities, so the ability of people to choose was very limited. A comprehensive range of child care has now been developed, and there is free access for all three and four-year-olds. That is enormously important, and we must not underestimate the impact of such measures. I echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Sandra Osborne); if child care is so important, why was provision so terrible under the previous Tory Government?

Mrs. Laing: It was not terrible under the last Tory Government, but it will be better under the next Tory Government in eight weeks' time. I look forward to having a further argument about that.

The Minister and some of her colleagues speak very well about child care. However, although they have taken many steps over the past seven years, which I welcome, the number of nurseries has been cut from 500 to 400 during their time in government. That is a fact.

Sandra Gidley: The hon. Lady was very scathing about wraparound care from 8 in the morning until 6 pm, but, when my children were of school age, that was the most difficult kind of care to access. What does she suggest as an alternative, because not all child minders want to take children before and after school, and not everybody wants to choose a nanny or a workplace nursery?

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Lady makes a perfectly reasonable point. I am not saying that wraparound care from 8 am until 6 pm in the school setting is wrong in all circumstances. There are some circumstances in which it might work quite well, but the Government have made much of it, and it is not the answer to all the challenges and problems that we face.

Peter Bottomley: I shall speak briefly, as a founder member of the Denis Thatcher society, which is for men who are married to women more important than they are. If we are seriously talking about 8 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the evening for a child, which is 50 hours for a five-day week, and if we are asking that adults do not have so long at work, we will have a slight problem if this extends too far.

We also ought to think about inter-generational care. We should consider not only young people caring for the elderly, but whether grandparents can care more for their grandchildren in order to help their children. That is, perhaps, not an English tradition, but it is a tradition of many of the people who join and enrich our country.

If we want to improve the home-work balance, we ought to try to cut the time and cost of commuting, because lots of people spend many hours travelling between home and work, and that is a tremendous waste.

Mrs. Laing: As ever, my hon. Friend makes some excellent points. His final point on transport—a topic on which he is an expert—goes to show that although we have narrowed the subject of today's debate to specific issues, the general issue is affected by almost every area of policy. Every person in the country is a member of a family and has social and family responsibilities, duties, and pleasures, as well as duties and so forth at work, and as a citizen. This issue has to be looked at holistically.

4.30 pm

Sitting suspended for Divisions in the House.

5.10 pm

On resuming—

Mrs. Laing: My hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) had just made an excellent point about grandparents playing a role in caring for their grandchildren when we broke for the Divisions. I believe that we should find some way of changing the way in which child minders are regulated to allow grandparents to benefit from officially being child minders when they look after their grandchildren. I do not suggest for a moment that a grandmother should have to pass lots of tests in order to look after her grandchildren, but there are ways in which we could reform the present system so that grandparents could in some circumstances officially be child minders and therefore benefit financially from looking after their grandchildren. I believe that that idea has the support of the National Childminding Association.

[Mrs. Laing]

My hon. Friend highlighted an important point there, as a great many grandparents—grandfathers as well as grandmothers—play an important part in caring for and bringing up their children's children. To bring more flexibility and choice, and to increase the supply side of child care—in other words having more child care workers qualified and in place, which is desperately needed—it is essential to make the tax credit system simpler to understand and administer. Many thousands of families in this country right now could benefit more from the tax credit system if only they knew how to do so. It does not make sense to have a system that normal people cannot properly access.

Julie Morgan: Grandparents are very important. In south Wales it is traditional for the grandparents to look after the grandchildren. My mother looked after my children. In what ways does the hon. Lady think that child-minding regulations could be amended? I have sympathy with what she is saying but does she have any proposals about how that could happen?

Mrs. Laing: I do not have formal proposals to make at this stage. I believe that whereas a child minder can be paid to be a child minder, if a grandparent is an informal child minder, he or she cannot benefit from any kind of public funding. In many cases, grandparents who do just a couple of hours here and there to help out do not want to be paid for it. I do not suggest that it should become any kind of necessity or normality, but where a grandparent effectively spends a working week looking after their grandchildren, and if they also looked after a couple of other children, why should they not be able to benefit from getting a grant to be a child minder? At present a grandparent cannot do so, by virtue of being a grandparent.

A grandparent who looks after three children who are someone else's grandchildren can register to be a child minder. If one of the children the grandparent minds is their grandchild, they cannot register to be a child minder and therefore do not have access to public funding. In order not to prolong the debate, if I am technically not quite right, I shall withdraw that point.

If we truly have the flexibility that we are talking about, we ought to be able to help grandparents spend even more time looking after their grandchildren, because everyone recognises that that is a good way to bring up children, and that the next best thing to being with one's own parents is being with one's grandparents. Indeed, as a small child, I much preferred being with my grandmother; I am sure most people feel like that. Forgive me if I have not got the exact points correct, but I think that we are all agreed that that matter needs to be examined.

Another important issue is that of pregnancy discrimination. The hon. Member for Ayr mentioned research carried out by the Equal Opportunities Commission into pregnancy discrimination. It is absolutely appalling that in Britain in the 21st century 30,000 women have lost their jobs because they are expecting children. I have a lot of sympathy with their position because, four years ago, when we were approaching a general election, I could no longer hide from the world in general the fact that I was about to have a baby. I have to admit, within the confidentiality of these four walls, that I was concerned that the voters of Epping Forest might practise discrimination against me at that point, because a certain generation would argue that if a woman is about to have a child, she cannot possibly be a Member of Parliament. I am glad to say that the voters of Epping Forest are wonderful people who exercise excellent judgment, and that they did not take that view at all. Indeed, many more of them voted for me when I was about to have a child than had voted for me four years previously when I was not about to have a child.

Ms Munn: Will the hon. Lady test it out again?

Mrs. Laing: No. I will definitely not take that chance again, and most certainly not if the election is in eight weeks' time. I can make that promise to my constituents and my family.

It is a serious matter that employers can find a way around the current laws. I do not suggest that we need much of a change in the law in that area. We need a change in attitudes in the workplace, because some types of employer twist the law and manage to get rid of a woman because she is about to have a child. Such attitudes ignore the fact that we need women in the work force; as I said earlier, that is not a luxury.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, North mentioned the international aspect of international women's day. On the day—last Tuesday—I also spent some time on those sorts of issues. I visited the Terence Higgins Trust, which I think is in the constituency of the hon. Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck). I apologise if I did not tell the hon. Lady in advance that I was going to be there. I was accompanying the Leader of the Opposition. It was a pleasure to visit the hon. Lady's constituency and to see the work of the trust, of which I am sure that she is well aware, as will most hon. Members.

The issues being dealt with at the trust make one realise the enormous gap between the struggle that we women in the western world face compared with women in Africa, Asia and the far east, who still struggle with the absolute basics. For example, many cannot choose when or whether they are going to have children or more children. The issues that we looked at on Tuesday concerned the fact that thousands of women cannot protect themselves, and therefore their future children, from HIV/AIDS. I mention that point because it is one on which I believe that there will again be consensus. While thinking about the struggles that we have, it is important to think how the work-life balance does not matter to women in those countries, because they are struggling with basic oppression. Having a work-life balance to think about would be a luxury to them; they are literally dealing with matters of life and death.

I was pleased to hear the Minister say that the commission is examining occupational segregation and the pay gap. As many hon. Members will have seen, the Fawcett Society produced a most interesting and well researched report earlier this week, which showed that, shockingly, the pay gap between men and women is about 20 per cent. for people in full-time employment. Women in part-time employment are paid 40 per cent. less than their male counterparts. It is scandalous and appalling that employers in Britain today think that that is acceptable. It shows that we, as a society, do not properly value the work of women who are doing two or three jobs, one of which is bringing up children. The reason why most women have part-time employment is because they are juggling other responsibilities with their employment. Indeed, as in the example used by the hon. Member for Ayr, they may have more than one part-time job, simply to try to make ends meet. When people have a part-time job they are undervalued, and a 40 per cent. pay gap is simply not acceptable.

I am not particularly saying that the Minister must do something about that now. To combat it we need a complete change in attitudes, whereby women are valued for being mothers, carers and responsible family members as well as valuable employees in the work force.

When we talk about employees, however, we must also bear in mind the position of employers. The worst thing that legislation can do is put so many burdens upon employers in order to protect women in the work force that employers find it necessary to try to find a way of not employing women at all. The pendulum could swing too far. A large organisation that has an efficient human resources department can do much to help and protect women in the work force that small employers cannot do. In all that we say and do, we must remember that most people in Britain are employed by small and medium-sized enterprises, not by large employers. Therefore, it is vital that any regulations made to try to achieve equality and support for women do not go so far that employers do not employ women at all. That would not be what we set out to achieve. We must be careful to achieve the right balance.

We need women in the work force, and we need a future generation to be born and nurtured. Therefore, we must take seriously the need to achieve a proper balance between work life, home life and family responsibilities. We have had a constructive debate on all those issues and I am sure that the Minister has taken note of some of the good ideas that have come from hon. Members.

5.24 pm

Jacqui Smith: I wholeheartedly agree with what the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) said about the quality of our debate. I set a few questions and challenges at the beginning, and hon. Members have risen to them in terms of the quality of the argument and some of the practical proposals that were made. I very much commend that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Ms Munn) drew on her understanding of children's development and needs—as she often does, as I know from experience. She strongly made the case, as did others, that we need to develop opportunities for both fathers and mothers to play their role in caring. The fact that we are taking forward proposals for sharing extended maternity leave between mothers and fathers is an important step, not only in practical terms, in that it allows fathers to have time off in the first year of their child's life, but also in terms of addressing the cultural issues that hon. Members raised. It is important that we say that our society believes that fathers have a role in caring for their children and that we provide the legislative basis and support for that.

My hon. Friend also rightly identified the excellent work carried out by USDAW in its "Supporting Parents and Carers" campaign. She mentioned its analysis, which is that the problem of finance is often what brings women back to work more quickly than they want or when their children would not benefit from them going back to work so soon. That is why the increase in maternity pay and the extension of maternity leave will be so important, not only for mothers, but also for children. USDAW, as a good example of a modern trade union, is now including in its negotiations the consideration of work-life balance issues and flexibility in conditions of employment. I commend it on its campaign and on its activities and negotiations with employers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) made an important contribution, using her personal experience, and I want to address the issues raised about carers. I hope that she had a suitable celebration for St. David's day, international women's day and mothers day. Either she or my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Sandra Osborne) proposed a party for international women's day. That received great approbation broadly, and not just from hon. Members, although I know that we are not supposed to mention others. Perhaps the House authorities should give some thought to that suggestion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North talked about the progress that we as a Government have made on tackling domestic violence. She also picked up on the point made by the hon. Member for Epping Forest, who mentioned the international nature of international women's day, which sets our debate in the context of the international challenges that women face. Last week, I was fortunate enough to attend the Commission on the Status of Women at the United Nations, 10 years on from the Beijing "Platform for Action". I was struck by those parts of the Beijing platform that are important for women across the world, including access to the labour market, economic empowerment and tackling violence against women. We certainly have some issues of commonality, but the hon. Member for Epping Forest is right to outline the particular challenges that women in developing countries face, which we all have a responsibility to help them to address.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North focused her contribution on her experience of caring, and talked movingly about caring for her mother. She gave us a clear understanding of the massive contribution that carers make, not only in terms of replacing services that otherwise would need to be publicly funded. She also identified the emotional commitment, time, planning and organisation that goes into the sort of caring that she and millions of other people in this country carry out. We should place a suitable value on that. As a Government, we should take action to support carers, and we have.

[Jacqui Smith]

I was struck by my hon. Friend's point about the need to be able to phone home to check up on what is happening. Many carers have said that when combining their caring with work, relatively small changes and provisions made by employers can sometimes make all the difference. Access to a phone to check home and a little flexibility about leaving in an emergency can keep carers in work.

The hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) emphasised the significance of the fact that when a carer falls out of the job market, it is often more difficult for them to get back in again. The Carers (Equal Opportunities) Act 2004, which was supported by the Government and to which my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North referred, does a number of important things. First, it ensures that carers know that they are entitled to an assessment. Secondly, it makes explicit that other aspects of carers' lives, such as their need or wish to work, have to be borne in mind in the assessment and the support with which they are provided.

This year, £60 million has been devoted in 2005–06 to the carer's grant, providing services to carers, but also, importantly, providing the breaks referred to by the hon. Member for Romsey. We have introduced direct payments to give carers more flexibility about how and where they access those breaks and support. To ensure that local authorities also focus on carer support, the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), introduced a new performance indicator on carer support for local authorities, identifying the significance of ensuring that that support is in place.

Carers also often suffer detriment in their pension provisions, particularly if they have to leave work. Having introduced a second state pension to boost the pension rights of many of those under-looked in the previous system, such as carers, we have so far benefited 1.9 million female carers, who can build up additional state pensions for the first time.

We need to do more to value and recognise the tough lives of carers. Some important progress has been made. My hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) made a good point about the need to recognise that, although the first year of a child's life is very important, some of the challenges of the early teens and teenage years can be equally difficult, as all of us whose children are now slightly older know. We need to ensure that flexibility is available, which is why considering how we might extend flexible working to such people is important.

There has been some discussion of out-of-school child care places, but, especially when children are between 11 and 14, wraparound care and the ability to have a bit of extra time after school so that the children do not have to come home to an empty house—not, as was suggested, to put a child into child care at 8 in the morning and pick them up at 6 in the evening—will be important for parents. That is exactly what our proposals should deliver.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ayr spoke with great understanding and knowledge from her experience with Women's Aid. She spoke not only about domestic violence, but identified the importance of child care to all women, in particular to women with specific needs, such as those who are victims of domestic violence or who are lone parents. If ever the benefits that come from investment in child care places were needed, they are needed by such women.

My hon. Friend also identified the need to ensure that we make work pay. The introduction of tax credits and the way in which they are paid to the main carer, and the improvements in the levels of child care tax allowance, have been important to enable women not only to get into work, but to ensure that they have the income that they need to support their families.

The hon. Member for Romsey touched on some slightly worrying things in a wide-ranging speech, and prompted a discussion about the role of men, possibly at the invitation of my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North. Although I agree that there are some cultural challenges with respect to men and their attitude to housework and caring, that does not mean that we should give up on the push to develop a more equal approach, to both caring and housework. I cite the excellent and commendable example of my husband, who was willing to give up his main career to play a major role in bringing up our children. There are some beacons out there and we need to ensure that they shine on men throughout the country.

The hon. Member for Romsey also made an important point about the impact of flexible working and maternity provision on small and medium-sized companies, as did the hon. Member for Epping Forest. There is a particular challenge, as I suggested earlier, in allowing small companies to plan for the implications of somebody taking maternity leave. That is more straightforward for a large company with many workers.

Several hon. Members argued that small businesses are increasingly recognising the benefits for their business of helping women to return to work after maternity leave. Given that it takes an average of £4,000 simply to recruit somebody, and given the training provided for women workers, losing them automatically when they have children is not good for them or the businesses. Nevertheless, we have recognised some of those challenges and will consult on two issues in the "Work and Families: Choice and Flexibility" consultation document.

First, we will see how we can improve communication between employers and women who are on maternity leave. Secondly, we will find out whether there is scope in extending the notice period that women give before they return to work. In both cases, it is about helping small and medium-sized companies communicate and plan. We are concerned to hear from employers about how we can implement that measure in a way that will benefit their women workers and themselves.

The hon. Member for Epping Forest suggested that working hours had increased, but they have reduced on average since 1997, when we signed the social chapter and implemented the working time legislation, which was, to introduce a tinge of political controversy, wrongly opposed by her party. We should be honest about identifying the trend for shorter working hours and saying that this Government, with their commitment to better working conditions for people, are enabling that to happen.

I agree with hon. Members who said that there is a cultural, as well as a legal, issue about long hours. We have to change the attitude that says that longer is always better, because in this case quality is more important than length. With those words, I will not venture to comment on what the hon. Member for Romsey said about Kinsey.

The hon. Lady asked whether it is too easy for firms to reject a request for flexible working. We have designed the law to help discussions between employers and employees on solutions that suit them both. The introduction of the flexible working legislation has massively reduced the proportion of flexible working requests refused. The trend appears to be continuing: the most recent data indicate that just 8 per cent. are declined.

I am sure that we could all agree with the hon. Member for Epping Forest on a number of things, although I do not agree that the concept of choice is the sole possession of the Conservative party. For a choice to be meaningful, it must be supported. Where women want to go to work, for instance, choice must be supported by the ability to work flexibly or to access child care. Had the Government not taken the decisions that we have and made progress, those things would not be available. We not only support choice, but take action to ensure that that choice is available for a broader range of women.

The hon. Lady and others referred to the New Woman survey. The conclusion that we should draw from that part of the debate is that families will want to live in many different ways and that women will have different aspirations. Some will want to stay at home, or be able to afford to do so, some will want to work part time and some will want to work full time. What women should avoid is allowing anybody, anywhere, to play us off against each other because of the decisions that we choose to make. That does not happen with men. We should be clear that we want the ability to make the decisions that suit our families and to be supported in those.

The hon. Lady was right to make the economic and social case for work-life balance. Encouraging all employers to do what the best do is an important way forward. She, like other hon. Members, touched on the Equal Opportunities Commission's investigation into pregnancy discrimination. As I said, the EOC has published its interim report. As part of our consultation on work and families, we have included the EOC's top two interim recommendations. Those were, first, consulting on whether there should be a written statement of rights and responsibilities for employees and employers during pregnancy, and, secondly, giving employers the right to request information from an employee about her planned return date. We are keen to hear views from parents, carers and employers about those recommendations.

Finally, on equal pay, since 1997 the pay gap has been closing. It is now approximately 14 per cent. in median terms.

Sandra Gidley: I am glad that the Minister says that the pay gap is 14 per cent. in median terms, because the way in which the pay gap is calculated was recently changed and we have only just started to use the median as our measure. Will she confirm that, if we had continued to use the mean—an average rather than a mid-point—the pay gap would still be 19 per cent.? It has not fallen.

Jacqui Smith: No. I confirm that the figure is 18 per cent., or something like that, but I will not agree with the hon. Lady that it has not fallen. Regardless of whether the mean or the median is used, the pay gap has fallen since 1997. The justification for using the median as opposed to the mean is that, taking as it does the mid-point, the median represents the situation for the vast majority of women and is not distorted by particularly high pay for men at the top.

Sandra Gidley: Earlier, hon. Members raised the fact that women are often in low-paid jobs, such as child care. Those jobs are below the median wage. A disproportionate number of women earn lower, rather than higher, salaries. Many would therefore argue that the mean is a fairer and more accurate way of assessing the pay gap, because it takes into account the large number of women on low pay.

Jacqui Smith: Some people might argue that, but the Office for National Statistics argued that we should use the median pay gap. As I suggested earlier, it is important that we understand the trend over time and use either method. There has been a reduction in the pay gap.

Incidentally, I am not saying that that is adequate. The hon. Lady's point about the impact of occupational segregation on the pay gap is very important. That is precisely why the women and work commission will focus on occupational segregation and why it will examine how we value women's work, and caring work in particular. It will make recommendations, which I look forward to seeing.

We have had a very good debate. The values that inspired international women's day—respect for the dignity of all women and international solidarity—are as relevant to us today as they were to those pioneering women who used as their slogan, and fought for, bread and roses when marching 100 years ago.

For a long time, women have been struggling to achieve a balance between work, other necessities and the other things in our lives. We also recognise, however, that we need to find new solutions to the issues that women face today. That is not an easy task in a global and complex 24/7 culture, but our vision of a modern Britain is one that uses the skills and talents of all citizens irrespective of their gender, race, age and sexuality and of whether they are disabled or able-bodied. Our vision supports everyone, but women in particular, in being able to take the decisions that they believe to be right for themselves and their families. That is how we can ensure the well-being and prosperity of our nation for years to come.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at thirteen minutes to Six o'clock.